Mr Vaile has been writing a series of wonderfully illustrated articles in the Field on the subject of the swerve in bowling. As there seems to be a good deal of money to be made by any one who can teach a youngster to swerve in bowling I vainly endeavoured to make head or tail out of the articles. But compulsory Greek has killed applied science. However, a gunnery expert clears up the matter most succinctly and explicitly in the Field this week. He says:—

> Mr. L. S. Bidwell put the whole question in a nutshell when he pointed out that "any spinning body projected through the air in such a direction that it has a component of translational velocity in a plane perpendicular to the axis of spin will undergo a continuous displacement away from that side whose tangential motion, due to spin, is in the same direction as that component of the translational motion of the body." It seems to me that once this is recognised the subject is closed so far as the general reader is concerned.

Mr. Bidwell, I may mention, explained the matter in this way in Engineering in September, 1900. I wonder how many young gentlemen who have become schoolmasters on the strength rather of their cricketing than their educational capacities could really explain this proposition. Fortunately, the Field gives a simple explanation of this scientific expression. It is a peculiar thing that scientific men use such incomprehensible phrases to enunciate a simple proposition. I wish simple English were made compulsory in all schools. These scientific axioms remind one of the man who said that sea-sickness would be avoided if the periodicity of the ship synchronised with the periodicity of the swell.

It was rather hopeless to expect to draw a line as to the prospects of the University Rugby match from the play last Saturday. The Old Merchant Taylors took down too weak a team to expect to be able to extend Cambridge. Oxford, on the other hand, made their weakness forward apparent by suffering defeat at the hands of Blackheath pretty well to the same extent that they did from Richmond. On the whole the game will depend on the forwards. But the Cambridge men must not make the mistake of trying to play a tight forward game. They ought to be stronger than the Oxford pack. To win they must set to work to rush the Oxford men off their feet. Otherwise the Dark Blues are sure to get a chance of getting their backs in motion, and then if Raphael is in form they will win.

I do not think I ever read anything more unworthy of an old University man than the disgraceful suggestion made in the Press by Mr. A. O. Jones, the Notts cricketer and Midland three-quarter, that Cambridge University refused to turn out against Leicester because they had not MacLeod and Mainprice playing for them. I read that owing to the frost the ground was in places still covered in order to make a fall less dangerous. In the local Press it was stated that hard collaring would be dangerous. The Press was not at one with the referee, but I have not the slightest doubt that the Cambridge captain exercised a wise discretion in not playing. I have some idea of the state of ground on which certain clubs will play when there is a gate to be considered. No doubt the referee will report the matter to the Rugby Union if he considers that his authority was defied.

Stock Markets Active—Feeling Good—Markets Broadening—A Pause for Breath—Monetary Position Good—The Most Promising Markets.

CONDITIONS on the Stock Exchange are for the most part favourable, and I have to report a distinct increase in business. It has not been distributed generally, and the Home and American Railways have been more than a little neglected, while towards the end the volume of dealing shows some contraction all round. This, however, is not a regrettable affair. A pause in the upward movement permits of breathing space, and makes more for confidence and the broadening out of business than any skyrocket rise, which is all too apt to be followed by an equally sudden drop, leaving the miserable shareholder nothing but the barren stick for his trouble and expense. Apart from the miserable war in the East and the possible outbreak of further capers by the valiant warships now on the way to Port Arthur, everything makes for good trading. The monetary position is the dominant factor, and that is altogether satisfactory. It has not been found necessary to advance the Bank rate beyond 3 per cent., at which it has stood since April last, and it looks now as though we shall get beyond the turn of the year without any change, in spite of the foreign calls upon us and the invariably strong inquiry for loans which marks that period. Some correspondents were at one time disposed to regard my views on the monetary outlook as a trifle too sanguine, but I think the facts justify me. Capital is available in greater volume for investment and speculation, and, what is more, it is better distributed, the class which keeps things moving cheerfully in normal times having more surplus at its disposal than it has had hitherto since we embarked upon our little war in South Africa. In the New Year, we ought to have really lively markets, and, for my part, I am inclined to plump for two departments—South Africans, because conditions there are brightening every day; and Home Railways, because they have been badly neglected while virtually every other market has witnessed activity and a big rise in values.

Money Cheap Again—Bank Rate Unchanged—Foreign Demands for Gold—The German Menace—Year-end Demands—Gold from India—Bank's Position.

The great feature of the Money Market is the retention of the Bank rate at 3 per cent. The drain on the Old Lady's resources of gold is pretty severe, but Egypt is not taking so much as had been anticipated, and some portion of the requirements of Argentina is being diverted; added to which, the buying of Argentine securities on Buenos Ayres account has during this past year been on a very large scale, thereby offsetting to some extent the necessity for shipments of gold to move the crops. The German menace, which threatened more than any other influence to force action upon the Bank of England's Directors, is now entirely removed, and although recent arrivals of gold have gone to that country, it is only at a reduced price, bar gold being now back again to 77s. 10d. per oz. Supplies on the market are increased by the greater willingness of the joint-stock banks to grant facilities, now that the month has turned and their balance-sheets are made up, by the distribution of a number of dividend payments, and by the large sum obtained from the Bank of England by the discounting of bills which will not mature until the New Year. For the next week or two, therefore, loans may be expected to be cheap. But the ease will not extend beyond then—until the beginning of January, I mean—because there is a big rush for accommodation during the last ten or fourteen days of the year. Discount rates are disposed to be easier, owing to the condition of the Money Market, and for fine three-months drafts the rate is only 2⅞ per cent. The fact that a million in sovereigns is on the way from India, and that it is due to arrive just when it will be most wanted, makes for ease. The latest Bank return shows a decrease of £926,000 in the reserve, the stock of coin being reduced by £305,000, while the circulation of notes is up to £621,000.

Consols Active—Other Government Stocks Sympathise—New Zealand Loan—Foreigners Firm—Spanish and Exchange Reforms—"War" Stocks Steady—Peruvian Report.

Quite a large volume of business has been passing in the gilt-edged market, and, though it seems to be slackening off somewhat, no doubt a renewal of the support will be forthcoming, provided no untoward developments arise to act as a deterrent. The Consols settlement revealed nothing of exceptional interest, beyond an appreciably higher carry-over rate of 4—4¼ per cent. This naturally did not create a favourable impression, but it came to be recognised that the usual year-end monetary conditions were the chief reason for this higher charge, rather than any increase in the "Bull" position. The Funds moved ahead quite cheerfully, being helped by the large shipment of gold from India, which it is thought will materially assist the Bank and minimise the risk of any advance in the Bank rate, and though the latest New Zealand issue and rumours of large withdrawals of the metal served to create a somewhat heavy feeling towards the close, on balance the stock is well up, if allowance is made for the deduction of the quarterly dividend. In sympathy, other Government stocks have been more cheerful. Local Loans, Transvaal Threes, Irish Land stock, and the War Loan displaying a better appearance, while the Water Board stock has received an encouraging fillip by the fixing of the special settlement for the 21st current. In the Colonial group, little interest has been manifested, apart from the latest New Zealand loan for £1,000,000, which takes the form of Seven Years' Convertible Debentures bearing 4 per cent. interest. Offered at par, the bonds will be redeemable at the same figure in 1912, and holders can exercise the option to convert into New Zealand Three and a Half per Cent. Inscribed Stock. This announcement has had practically no effect upon the existing stocks, which remain unchanged. The new issue is quoted at a small premium. There has been a fair amount of Continental support for Foreigners, and the general tendency remains quite satisfactory, Spanish being somewhat a feature of the proposal of the country's Prime Minister to introduce a bill having as its object the steadying of the exchange. True enough, it is not the first of its kind, but on this occasion the general impression is that the reform will be carried out. Among the "war" stocks, nothing fresh has transpired in connection with the impending Russian loans to affect the country's stocks adversely, and they have been inclined to improve slightly; while as regards Japanese issues, they move within narrow limits just as the popular fancy interprets the progress of the struggle in the vicinity of Port Arthur. A little more attention is being paid to Chinese stocks, and in the South American group Brazilians and Argentines are bought more freely, but they are without any outstanding feature, except perhaps in the case of Buenos Ayres Provincial Cedulas, support for which has again been induced by rumours of an alternative settlement. Chilians keep buoyant, and Uruguays, too, are steady, the news from the country seeming to indicate that the disarmament of the insurgents as well as the negotiations between the two contending parties are proceeding satisfactorily. Peruvians have displayed less animation, and on the whole the tendency has been to dwindle away, as the result of the profit-taking induced by the publication of the report. In respect of the negotiations with the Government, the statements in the document are less encouraging than had been hoped, it being implied that though the Government has obtained powers to settle its outstanding differences with the Corporation, they will not become inoperative until July, 1906, which fact seems to leave scope for much more procrastination. The Board, however, are hopeful that the results will be achieved at no distant date "on terms just and equitable to both parties."

Home Railways—Investment Buying—Market Prospects Better Trade Outlook—Southern Stocks Strong—North-Westerns to the Front—Great Centrals—Preference Stocks for Investment.

There is a fair amount of investment buying of Home Railway stocks, but speculative support is on a poor scale, and while still preserving a good undertone, the market is languishing to some slight extent. It seems to me that this neglect is unwarranted, and that the man who goes into the market and buys to hold into the early part of the New Year will make a more than respectable profit for himself. While every other section has responded more or less to the better influences prevailing, Home Railway stocks have lagged rather sadly. They have not been entirely neglected, and as compared with the prices ruling at the end of September, some moderate gains have been registered. But the support has been indifferent, and I should say that—simply by virtue of the neglect, coupled with merits which are not generally recognised yet—this is the market which will be taken in hand next. It is true that earnings are not exactly exhilarating, but with the exception of only three or four companies, they still indicate increases, and in the case of those three or four, liberal allowance must be made for underestimation; and it should be recognised also that traffic is being worked more economically, and that capital charges are being kept down. The trade outlook is improving, and the return upon one's investment is anything but meagre. Operators do not seem able to look beyond the immediate run of indifferent earnings, whereas it is quite certain that with the turn of the year at the latest, when money will be cheap and dividend speculation will have been initiated, the conditions will be such as to induce a general and pretty substantial advance in values. Therefore, I regard Home Railways as quite attractive for a purchase into the New Year. During the past week the movements have not been material, but good spots there have been here and there. Southern stocks have come into favour, especially Chatham Ordinary and Second Preference, Brighton A, and South-Western Deferred, the last registering a fair gain on the week. Dover A has been kept down by the size of the "Bull" account, there being people about who, having bought when the stock was talked to 75 or 85, or some such preposterous figure, are still holding on, hoping against hope that they may get out without loss. There are a score or more of stocks more attractive on their merits than Dover A—stocks which give a direct return in the shape of dividend as well as the hope of a good appreciation when the market receives its turn. It ought to be remembered that all the dividend-paying stocks now carry half a year's interest, and that some of them—Brighton A, South-Western Deferred, Great Northern Deferred, and some others—are loaded with almost a full year's dividend. Recognition of this fact will show that as they stand they are cheap. The "heavy" stocks are safe for a good yield, with every likelihood of a substantial advance in quotations, and while Great Westerns are helped by exceedingly satisfactory earnings, North-Westerns will lead the way in the general advance, which is overdue, and seems now to be imminent. Great Central Junior issues are less attractive now than they were a couple of months ago; in the 1894 Preference the advance has been very striking, and well as the Company is progressing, the immediate prospects appear now to have been pretty liberally discounted. While Central Londons keep firm, the stocks of the Underground companies are disposed to react, from fear of the proposed Great Western's line from Shepherd's Bush to the western suburbs, which would serve as a feeder to the "tube." Movements during the week are shown in my table below:—

Preference and other prior charge stocks have kept firm recently, and they are now being bought in expectation of a general advance in gilt-edged investment stocks in the New York; in addition to which they are full of half a year's dividend.

American Rails Inactive—Operators Shy—Sentiment "Bullish," but Public Interest Declining—The Presidential Message—Heavy Stocks Supported—Northern Securities.

On the New York market there has been much activity in American rails, and the daily dealings have reached big figures. On this side, however, the interest has been very restricted, and it is to be feared that a respectable proportion of the dealings carried through have been on New York account, with the object of creating an impression that dealings here are broadening out. Rightly or wrongly, the speculators on this side are still fighting shy of Yankees, and the professional gentlemen are not indulging in any undue risks, realising presumably that the outlook is doubtful, and that values have already been brought tolerably high by the pre-Presidential election boom. From New York one hears that the sentiment is still "Bullish," but at the same time it is allowed that public interest is declining, and the market is now rather disposed to await the Presidential message, fearing that it may administer something of a shock by its references to the trusts and the necessity for a modification of the tariff. The "pool" manipulations, about which I had occasion to write some weeks ago, have now almost ceased—for the time being, at least, and the cheap rubbishy stocks are resting quietly, while the "heavy" and responsible dividend payers take the floor. In other words, the feature of the week has been the strength of such stocks as New York Centrals, Illinois Centrals, Milwaukees, Louisvilles, and Pennsylvanias, followed at a respectful distance by Baltimores. These stocks apart, there is little to which attention need be drawn. There was at one time a recurrence of the feverish demand for Northern Securities in anticipation of a legal decision, which ought to be announced before this issue of Truth is in the hands of its readers, and at the same time, support was forthcoming for Union Pacifics. The Gates interests bought Readings, and simultaneously circulated a report about an impending dividend, which the President of the road characterised afterwards—no doubt in a dry fashion—as "rather premature." My table is appended:—

Thomas Goode & Co.—China, glass pottery, fireproof ware. Sole agents in the United Kingdom for the famous "Bi-Metal" (copper lined with pure sheet silver) Cooking Utensils. Illustrated catalogues post free.—South Audley-street London.

Canadian Railways—Grand Trunk Position—Pacific Extension—Canadian Pacifics—Argentine Railways and the Strikes—Mexican Railways Weak—Mexican Centrals—San Paulos for Investors—Arica and Tacna Shares.

The Grand Trunk's revenue statement for October, showing an increase in net earnings of £1,000 (which brings the aggregate increase for the four months to £6,200), was not exactly to the liking of the market, which had looked for £4,000 or £5,000; but, having regard to the fact that there was one working day less than last year, the result is not really poor, and the financing scheme of the Grand Trunk Pacific soon brought about a readjustment of values. The official announcement is that Messrs. Speyer have bought, and will issue shortly, $6,600,000 Four per Cent. First Mortgage Lake Superior Division bonds and $8,000,000 Four per Cent. Mortgage (Prairie Division) bonds. Both bonds run for fifty years, and the capital and interest are unconditionally guaranteed by the Grand Trunk Railway of Canada. This purchase by Messrs. Speyer will enable the Company to begin construction immediately, and practically assures the carrying out of the Transcontinental Railway across Canada. The ultimate effect of the Pacific extension upon the fortunes of the Grand Trunk will unquestionably be beneficial, and, in relation to the immediate course of values, the market argues that the Speyer interests can hardly help giving support in order to pave the way for the bond issues. A factor of immediate consequence is that earnings are looking better, the comparison now being with moderate totals last year. There have been snowstorms in the country, but there is ground for the belief that the decrease in gross earnings for the four months will be appreciably reduced by the end of the year, and that in the early months of next year there will be a respectable improvement. As I have pointed out before, the actual sum of revenue is large, but the Company is handicapped by the failure to pay an interim dividend on even the First Preference stock. To pay in full for the twelve months on this it will need to find £171,000 after meeting all charges down to and including the Four per Cent. Guaranteed stock. This it will no doubt do. But there is room for some doubt on the score of the Second Preference receiving its full 5 per cent., although the Company ought to be in a position to do this if it is able to reduce expenditure on anything like the same scale as for the half-year to June, either by actual savings or by the temporary suspension of non-urgent works. For the December half of 1903 there was almost £400,000 available after paying rents, debenture interest, and other prior charges. The Guaranteed capital has been increased, and calls this half-year for £129,482, while to pay 5 per cent. on the Second Preference requires £120,500. In other words, the Company wants £426,982 to meet charges down to and including the Second Preference. Seeing that it reduced expenditure by £99,463 during the June half, it should be in a position to save about £30,000 during the second half. The price of Seconds shows that it is generally believed that it will do this. Next year, given a moderate winter, earnings will look handsome, because they will go against a long run of decreases, and speculation is likely to become very active, with rising prices. In Canadian Pacifics there is little change. The earnings keep on a big scale, and while the October statement shows a net decrease of $88,000, this may be regarded as exceptional. The Company's shares make a good investment purchase, bringing in about 4⅜ per cent., with the likelihood of a good advance in the long run, as the line derives full benefit from the opening up of Financial Protection for Families or Provision for Old Age. The public is invited to apply for the new Prospectus of the Scottish Widows' Fund. Funds £17,000,000. Participating Life Assurances by Annual Premiums effected before December 31st next, will, at the next Division of Profits (1908) rank for Five years' Bonus Additions. Applications for such Assurances should not be delayed. 28, Cornhill, E.C., and 5, Waterloo Place, S.W.

Argentine Railway stocks are quiet, and still a little depressed, consequent upon the labour troubles, though these appear to be dying out. Should there be no violent outbreak and general disturbance, I look for a revival of activity in this market with the moving of the wheat crop, which will come soon, as the harvest has already commenced in Santa Fé. The Great Southern earnings are very satisfactory, the latest increase being £8,914, which gives the Company £154,956 for the half-year to date. The passing of the Currency Reform Bill has not had a good effect upon the issues of the Mexican Railway, the "Bull" account in these being very heavy. Mexican Central bonds are also depressed on the abandonment of the united action for the protection of the bondholders' interests. This Company's stocks are worth looking at, as the earnings are good, and the Company will derive much advantage from the fixing of the dollar at a fair level. For the first quarter of the financial year the traffics increased by $457,644, equal to about 35 per cent., and the position with the prior lien and consolidated mortgage bonds is reasonably secure. The chances of the junior securities rest largely upon the endeavours of rival interests to secure control. Brazilian Railway stocks show little movement, but San Paulos are firm. They are a rather heavy weight, of course, but they ought to prove attractive to the man who is on the look-out for a 7 per cent. security. The traffic increase for twenty-one weeks amounts to £99,353, and there is more to follow. The Company is very well managed, is in English hands, and for each of the last three years 12 per cent. has been paid. There has been some inquiry for the shares of the Arica and Tacna Railway in view of the possibility of the line being acquired in connection with a scheme to provide direct communication between the rich mineral district of La Paz and the Coast. The £10 shares, which are fully paid, stand now at 3¾ buyers, and are a promising speculative holding.

South Africans Brisk—Bucket-shop Influences—Markets Strong in Tone—French Support—More Stamps Dropping—Anglo-French Exploration Issue—"Lewis and Marks, Limited"—Barnato Shares—Steyn Estates—Welgedacht's Coal Strike—Diamond Shares—Deep Levels.

In the earlier part of the week there were very large dealings in South Africans, and despite heavy realisations in the way of profit-taking, prices advanced considerably, the shares offered being absorbed willingly. The suspension of the London and Paris Exchange, which had large "Bear" lines open in Chartered and other Kaffirs, caused some uneasiness, and helped to a quieter condition of things, which continued down to Saturday, the last two days of the week witnessing a rather striking drying up of the speculative stream. The bucket-shop failure was, however, of little real consequence; its indebtedness to the members of the House was not very large, and the creditors were soon reassured. The tone of the market remains strong enough, and a renewal of active trade this week is probable. Occasional rests are good, for they afford some breathing space, and keep values from going ahead too rapidly. The condition of things on the Rand improves steadily, and the good Frenchman, who only buys on a buoyant market, is now operating freely. It is not generally realised to what extent this individual is supporting the market, nor is it properly understood that he is capable of giving very great help on occasion, since he is fond of Kaffirs, and has much money lying idle owing to distrust of home industrials. Good buying is coming also from Germany and other parts of the Continent, and the Cape is a discriminating purchaser of specialties. Owing to the better supply of labour, and the assurance of a sufficiency for immediate requirements, the mines are encouraged to set additional stamps to work. The Simmer and Jack and the Van Ryn are to increase the number dropping, and Knights have been extensively bought on the report that the mill was to commence crushing with 100 stamps on Friday. Another evidence of the better feeling is shown in the new Company flotations, and the issue of fresh capital by existing Companies. The Anglo-French Exploration, Company, Limited, announce that they have resolved to issue 150,000 Preference shares, being the balance of the Company's authorised capital, thus making the total capital 500,000 Ordinary shares and 500,000 Preference shares, all issued. In a circular the Directors state that these Preference shares carry the right to a fixed cumulative preferential dividend at the rate of 6 per cent. per annum, and rank both as regards dividend and capital in priority to the Ordinary shares. The issue will commence to rank for dividend from the 1st prox., and it has been decided to issue the shares at a premium of 2s. per share, in the proportion of three Preference shares for every ten Ordinary shares, to all Ordinary shareholders registered on 23rd ult., any shares not taken up by the shareholders being dealt with by the Board. The allotment letters will be issued to the Ordinary shareholders on Monday. The existing Preference shareholders have no right to an allotment. The week has witnessed a very important new issue—the African and European Investment Company, which might almost be called Lewis and Marks, Limited. The Company has been formed to consolidate and develop a large number of properties which have been selected by Messrs. Lewis and Marks, some of which have been held by them for many years. The purchase consideration for the whole of the properties and assets is £1,000,000 in fully-paid shares, in addition to which Messrs. Lewis and Marks have stipulated that, after the shareholders of the Company shall have received in cash (whether by way of dividend, bonus, or otherwise) an amount equal to the whole amount paid up on the shares held by them, they (Messrs. Lewis and Marks), on any further distribution, are to be paid one-fourth of the amount to be distributed. Amongst the assets taken over from the agency are agreements which that Company has entered into with a number of South African and other Companies to act as their secretaries or agents in London and in Paris. The prospectus contains a full schedule of the properties, from which it appears that the landed interests cover an area of 716,442 acres (equal to about 1,119 square miles), situated in the best known districts of the Transvaal and Orange River Colony, which have been most carefully selected with a view to mineral possibilities, as well as to their agricultural value. The Company owns the whole of the mineral rights over nearly all the area. In the Marico district alone the Company owns over 500 square miles. The Malmani Goldfields, which have been proclaimed as public diggings, are in close proximity to many of the Company's farms in this district, one of such farms being on the goldfields and already proclaimed. Marico and Rustenburg are considered to be amongst the best agricultural districts in the Transvaal, owing to the abundance of water and the rich quality of the soil. In the Zoutpansberg district the Company owns about 15,000 acres, situated on or in close proximity to the Smitsdorp Goldfields, one of the Company's farms, Zandrivier, having been proclaimed a public goldfield. The share interests at present market quotations exceed in value £400,000. The shares offered to the public number 250,000, issued at 30s., and the market has put a further premium of 5s. per share on them. Another new-comer is the New Districts Development Company, promoted by the H. E. Props group; it has a capital of £90,000 in £1 shares, of which 79,000 shares have been issued, leaving 11,000, which are held in reserve under option at £2 10s. From my table below it will be seen that values show improvement on the week:—

* £5 shares.

Goldfields have again been a noticeably strong market, and Gold Trusts have also been bought. Rand Mines, East Rands, Modders, and the other leading favourites have been fairly active on home as well as Paris account, this last centre being a buyer also of Randfonteins, Barneys, Johnnies, Simmer and Jacks, and others. The Barnato descriptions, after rather prolonged inactivity, have strengthened further. I am told that the firm has bought out all the interests which Mr. Carl Hanau held jointly with them, with the one exception of Coronation Syndicates, the whole of the Barnato holding in which (and it is not very large) will pass into the hands of another group. General Mining and Finance subsidiaries keep prominent, Steyn Estates in particular being bought on the report that milling will shortly be commenced, while much is made also of the expectation that the Roodepoort's United rich chute will extend into the property. Rand Collieries have been bought from Germany, and there has been much buying also of Van Dyks. The material increase which has taken place lately in the Company's assets has caused attention to be paid to Goerz shares. Eastern Rand descriptions have all been tolerably good. East Rand Mining Estates, Apex, Geduld, and Welgedachts are all higher. The last-named is especially strong. A message published some days ago stated that from appearances there was every possibility of further coal seams being struck. This expectation has been fulfilled, a later message stating that another seam has been struck of a width of 54 ft.—which is really handsome. An office note points out that the whole of the fuel may not be marketable, but such a thickness provides latitude for some waste. An inspection is to be made, and the result will be awaited with interest by all who are interested in the Welgedacht and in the Companies having properties adjacent thereto. The leading Diamond shares have been reactionary, except for Jagers, which keep firm. Premiers have gone back a couple of points, the recent sensational jump causing profit-taking, in addition to which it is denied that there is to be an amalgamation with the De Beers. The shares of this last Company are easier. Lace Diamonds have been active, and as a result of Dr. Corstorphine's report (which is favourable) concerning the prospects of the Company the shares had a big jump, but part of the rise has since been lost. Deep Levels have come into favour, Modder Deeps and Roodepoort Central Deeps being prominent:—

WESTRALIANS IDLE—NO INTEREST IN THE MARKET—THE STRENGTH OF KALGURLIS—ASSOCIATED AND LAKE VIEWS FIRM—CONCLUSIONS OF THE ROYAL COMMISSION—LITTLE KANGAROOS.

Once again has it to be chronicled that the Westralian market is in a somewhat inanimate condition, but on the whole the tendency has not been altogether unsatisfactory. Professionals and public alike seem to be looking on without any desire to operate. The feature has undoubtedly been the remarkable strength of Kalgurlis, in anticipation of the report, which proved to be very satisfactory. Associated have also improved as the result of favourable developments at the No. 10 level, the Iron Duke lode, carrying ore of a value of 35 dwt., having been encountered. Another cable from the Lake View property dealing with the striking of low-grade ore at the 1,600 ft. level also had a beneficial effect upon these shares, but otherwise the market has been devoid of interest, and prices for the most part are without much change on balance. It is rather opportune, I think, now that the interest of outsiders in the market is at such a low ebb, and shows no sign of expanding, to call attenion to the reported conclusion of the Westralian Royal Commission into the Boulder Deep Levels scandal, which occasioned such disgust a short time ago. From the evidence adduced it was clear that misleading statements were intentionally circulated when the abortive boomlet was in progress, but upon whom the responsibility for these rests is not quite certain. However, the Commission are of opinion that the secrecy which has hitherto been observed in regard to the working of many Westralian mines is not in the public interest, and it is said that these gentlemen recommend that all mines shall be open to inspection by shareholders at convenient hours; that the Minister of Mines shall be empowered to authorise an official to take samples from any property, inspect the workings, and compel the Companies to keep assay plans, also plans of the underground workings where they will be available for inspection by shareholders. It is further recommended that misrepresentation or concealment of facts shall be punishable by fine or imprisonment, and that managers' reports shall be published locally coincidentally with their reaching the head office. Even if all these recommendations are carried out with exactness there is no doubt that there is still scope for the practice of "Westralianism"; but on the whole the risk ought to be considerably minimised. Among the Little Kangaroos, Northern Terrors remain conspicuous at their lower level of about 3s., fluctuating around that figure from day to day, but on the other hand some more Colonial inquiries is reflected in the better appearance of Boulder Deeps. Here is my table:—

Rhodesians Less Animated—Tone Fairly Good—The Alluvial Discovery—Chartered Easier—Banket Developments—Amalgamation Proposals—Tanganyikas and Zambesias—Rhodesia Copper Flotation.

A pause is noticeable in the Rhodesian section after the marked activity resulting from the alluvial discovery announcement, and in the majority of cases a healthy setback from the higher levels prevailing a week ago has occurred. Though certainly quieter, it would be erroneous to conclude that the activity has ceased or that the general interest has evaporated, for they are still there, but both rather subdued. There has been a paucity of news concerning the prospects of the alluvial area of which so much was made, and this has given time for careful reflection upon its possibilities, and the prevailing impression received little stimulus from the Times' Cape Town correspondent's cable pointing out that the scarcity of water will be a hindrance of undoubted significance to militate against the economical development of the ground, while the fact that the area shows indications of ancient workings is also held in some quarters to detract from its potentialities. But as I have before said, we must wait for the result of the Chartered engineer's investigation before commenting upon the discovery as a factor in the exploitation, and incidentally the colonisation, of Rhodesia. Chartered shares have not maintained their position so well, losing about 5-32 on balance. Banket descriptions continue more or less in the background, though they were momentarily lifted from their comparative obscurity by the announcement of developments on the No. 2 level of the Eldorado claim. The message says that indications are improving, the average assay on the level just referred to, for instance, being 42 dwt. across 5 ft. throughout the drive, while the face shows very high-grade ore, and the eastern section proves continuity of reef of good value with a largely increased tonnage of ore at the east end. This is undoubtedly the most encouraging news given out for some time. Among the smaller gold mines, an interesting amalgamation proposal is announced, dealing with the fusion of the Eagle Vulture, Geelong, Jessie, and West Nicholson properties under the one title of East Gwanda. The decision to amalgamate has been come to because of the difficulties experienced in maintaining an adequate supply of native labour at isolated mines, as well as the economies which may be effected by working several mines under one management with one central reduction plant. The new concern will have a capital of £600,000 in £1 shares, of which 360,100 will be offered to the shareholders of the four Companies absorbed, credited with 14s. paid, and 100,000 allotted as fully paid in part settlement of liabilities, leaving 139,000 shares in reserve, subject to consent of the debenture-holders in the Geelong and West Nicholson Companies to exchange for an equivalent amount of Six per Cent. Debentures in the new Company. In the Northern group quite a fair amount of interest is still being manifested, Tanganyikas being helped by the report that work on the Lobito Bay Railway was resumed on November 26, while Zambesias have improved in anticipation of a favourable report by the Directors. Though Northern Coppers have lost a little of the ground recently gained, they are steady at the lower level, and Rhodesia Coppers are firm, deriving some benefit from the rumour that the Chartered Company have concluded to extend the railway from Victoria Falls, while the flotation of a subsidiary to develop the lead and zinc deposits in the Rhodesia Broken Hill mine has had a little effect. This Company will be known as the Rhodesia Broken Hill Development Company, and will acquire an area of about thirty-five square miles in the vicinity of the mine. My usual table is appended:—

West Africans Livelier—Another Spasm—Ashanti Goldfields Dullish—Amalgamated and Wassaus Improve—Egyptians Strong—Copper Shares Firm—Indians—Le Roi No. 2 Buoyant.

One of those outbursts of buoyancy which have characterised the West African Mining section within the past month or two is again conspicuous, and it is accompanied by the almost inevitable gossip concerning the brighter outlook for the industry. As a matter of fact, nothing has so far transpired to lead one to the belief that any important developments are impending, and it is quite safe to assert that the present condition is wholly artificial. It is the obvious result of professional manœuvring, that fraternity being induced to exert themselves by the cheerfulness prevailing in other mining sections, more especially South Africans, concluding in their usual optimistic way that if the public were displaying an active interest in that market, it would eventually enlarge and spread to the forlorn Jungle. It would, indeed, be remarkable if the outsiders were to begin to do so, after the sad experiences of the past few years, but the chances are much against any such manifestation of interest developing until inherent conditions are healthier, and decidedly more encouraging. The dullest spot has been Ashanti Goldfields, which for some inexplicable reason fail to participate in the upward movement, and at one time, when a general setback was occasioned by rumours regarding the fresh capital requirements of one of the leading mines, they developed rather marked weakness. The two outstanding features have been Gold Coast Amalgamated and Wassau, both of which have been twisted appreciably higher, the former being $\frac{5}{8}$ better than a week ago and the latter $\frac{3}{4}$, both very significant advances, while a few of the rubbishy descriptions also came in for a good deal of attention, with the usual result. My table of prices is appended:—

In the Miscellaneous market the feature has again been the strength of Egyptians, though there have been no sensational fluctuations in prices. Intermittent profit-taking naturally had the effect of neutralising previous gains, but on the whole the tendency is very satisfactory, and from the fact that Mr. J. B. Robinson has secured a controlling interest in Nile Valleys, it is a clear inference that the Egyptian Mining shares will stand out more conspicuously in the future than hitherto. Copper shares keep firm, despite the less encouraging position of the metal, but there have been few developments of interest to record. Indians continue steady, without much feature apart from the slight advance in Champion Reefs consequent upon the dividend announcement of 1s. 5d. per share, making 4s., or 160 per cent., for the year on the new half-crown shares, as compared with 16s. 6d., or 165 per cent., on the old 10s. shares. The difference in the return is explained to a great extent by the fact that the new shares did not fully participate in the profits last year. Ooregums strengthened a little on the cable pointing out that a vein 2 ft. wide had been intersected, assaying 15 dwt. Among British Columbians considerable attention has been paid to Le Roi No. 2, as a result of the belief that the Company will declare another dividend before the end of the current year, though it is exceedingly doubtful, I think, that any further distribution will be made pending a settlement, one way or another, of the option recently acquired. Mount Lyells have hardened further, and in the Charter Towers group Brilliant and St. George keep on the upgrade, while among New Zealanders, Waihi Grand Junctions are still in request.

A Sermon on Bucket-shops.

A tremendous amount of noise has been made in the daily papers over the suspension of the London and Paris Exchange. To judge from the fuss, one might imagine, did one not know better, that one of the pillars of our banking world had suddenly fallen away, causing widespread disaster. The simple fact is that a top-heavy bucket-shop—one of the superior sort, no doubt, but none the less a bucket-shop—found itself badly caught over the recent advance in values, and had to admit that, failing the clemency of its Stock Exchange creditors, there was nothing for it but to close its doors and go into liquidation. The Stock Exchange creditors, being convinced by the figures placed before them by Mr. Mandeville, have agreed to wait a little while for what he owes them, and by the aid of friends, the gentleman has been enabled to raise a round £100,000, with which he will meet immediate obligations towards clients, more particularly in respect of "call" options, on which the concern has been very badly caught, and during this week the doors at Basildon House are to be opened again and business will be resumed—not, it is hinted, on the old lines, which is a good start in the way of reform. The daily Press has been exceedingly sympathetic over this collapse, for what particular reason I confess I am unable to ascertain. I am free to admit that, so far as my knowledge goes—and readers of Truth are, as a rule, not slow to advise me when they have been "done"—the London and Paris Exchange has given its clients a fair run for their money, has paid up when the luck has gone against it, has advertised to the verge of prodigality, and along with its mining speculations on margin, and in the selling of options, has carried on a genuine investment business, especially in Industrials, for the behoof of small people who would not know how to approach a broker affiliated to the Stock Exchange. It has carried on a sort of banking business, which I suspect to have been more of a snare and an incitement to mining speculation than anything else, and has dabbled largely in real estate and insurance. But it remains that first and last the London and Paris Exchange has carried on the business of a bucket-shop primarily, the other branches being a sort of fringe to the elegant and tasty garment, and that it has been brought down by the inevitable operation of those circumstances which years ago brought down George Gregory, John Shaw, and other illustrious members of the race. To me the most striking feature of the affair is the lack of resistance which has been shown to adverse influences. The London and Paris Exchange has run in opposition to its clients—that is to say, man being by nature a "Bull," the Exchange has been a "Bear," and since the advent of the Boer war conditions were almost uniformly favourable to it. During the past four years it must have netted enormous sums out of marginal operations for the rise which did not come off, as well as out of "call" options, which were not exercised. And after all this it finds itself in trouble after something like a month of rising values! There has, I am afraid, been bad management and reckless speculation, or this smash could not so soon have happened. Nobody, of course, could have foreseen the enormous appreciation in Chartereds, in connection with which much money has been lost, by the granting of "call" options at ridiculously low rates. But reason or no reason, there is no room for doubt on the score of the rise in values, and any concern that goes on "Bearing" stocks which will persist in advancing must expect soon or late to be left "in the cart." This is what has happened. It was inevitable on a rising market, but, as I have said already, I am surprised that it should have happened so soon.

I understand that thousands of letters of sympathy have been received from clients up and down the country. I can quite imagine it, and if all the firm's clients are satisfied, having received a run for their money but no profit, there is nothing more to be said. There is certainly no room for sympathy with any one who may lose his or her money. My views are, by this time, I think, tolerably well known. I recommend no outside brokers, because the facilities which they profess to offer are all bunkum, and because the client has no such safeguard as is afforded by the Committee of the Stock Exchange against sharp or fraudulent practices on the part of its members. But this country is full of fools who are willing to risk a little money in the hope that they may make much—who would rather lose in the end than be deprived of their flutter; and as these are quite hopeless—they would not keep their cash if they could—they may as well throw it into the bottomless pit of the London and Paris Exchange as of any other concern operating on the same lines. Personally, after some years spent in warning people of the dangers they run in dealing with bucket-shops, I confess that I sometimes grow a little tired of the naïve—not to say idiotic—questions that are put to me, and of the guileless spirit which imagines that people are in business in the City of London in order to make the fortune of strangers out of a five-pound note. There are honest outside brokers, and it is as well that there should be, if only to prevent the growth of a monopolistic feeling among the gentry privileged to enter the doors of the big house in Throgmorton-street. But between them and the bucket-shop there is a world of difference. There are bucket-shops and bucket-shops—those who pay up on the rare occasions when they lose and those who, like the scoundrel who calls himself Herbert Smith, plead the Gaming Act, and play the game of "heads I win, tails you lose." The London and Paris Exchange ranks among the former; it has, I understand, paid up promptly, and that much, at least, is to be said for it. But it remains a bucket-shop, none the less. The legitimate business in stocks and shares which it has transacted on behalf of clients goes to its credit, but it is almost a negligible quantity beside the speculations in mines and other descriptions in which the Exchange has run, deliberately and as part of the system, against the public who have entrusted it with their money.

The regenerated concern, we are told, will be conducted on more conservative lines than the old one—some of the more reprehensible methods will be abandoned, and the aspiration is to make it a sort of "English Crédit Lyonnais." I do not regard the phrase as any compliment to the French concern, and I am free to confess that I do not see how the business is to be carried on for any length of time. Immediate liabilities on "call" options may be discharged, but there are plenty of others, and I imagine that the events of the past week will have done much to upset the confidence of the small investor no less than the speculator.

New Issues.

The following prospectuses have been published:—

African and European Investment Company. Capital, £1,000,000, in £1 shares, of which 250,000 are offered by Messrs. Lewis and Marks at a premium of 10s. per share. Particulars of the undertakings acquired will be found in my Kaffir article this week.

San Miguel Copper Mines.—Formed to acquire a Spanish mine of this name, which has been a producer for over thirteen years. The share capital is £150,000, in addition to which there are 6 per cent. debentures for £750,000. No subscriptions are asked from the public.

"Truth" Letter Box.

Correspondents will oblige by observing the following rules:—

Name and address, which must accompany all inquiries, should be written on the communication; cards are apt to be lost or misplaced, causing unnecessary trouble.

Anonymous letters will not in any case be attended to.

I cannot reply to inquiries by letter or telegram.

A nom-de-plume or initials (the former preferably) should be given if it is desired that the real name shall not appear in the paper.

Inquiries should be put as briefly as possible, plainly written, and numbered.

Communications received after Friday may not be replied to in the following issue. Delay may also occur where an exceptionally long list of securities is submitted.

I do not recommend brokers.

Government Securities.

Sigma.—I should suggest Chinese Fives, Japanese Sixes, Cuba Fives, and Egyptian State Domains, which would average rather more than 4½ per cent. For safe custody the bonds might be deposited at the bank. Premier.—The City of Mexico bonds are all right to keep, and Johannesburg Fours might be bought. Salisbury.—1. You cannot command 4½ per cent. on really gilt-edged descriptions. I suggest that you spread the money over Turkish Guaranteed, Johannesburg Fours, Chilians 1886, Chinese Fives, Japanese Sixes, Argentine Great Western Railway Preference stock, Grand Trunk Guaranteed, and Buenos Ayres Great Southern Ordinary. 2. Buy through a broker who is a member of the Stock Exchange. In the event of the contingency named the client's money would be safe. 3. The bank acts as agent only and takes no responsibility. Beaulieu.—1. I should prefer the Japanese Six per Cent. Loan. 2. The first of the two issues. 3. The two Six per Cent. Loans are secured on the Customs receipts of the country, and there is a good margin left after meeting the charges. Hop.—The Cuban Five per Cent. bonds make a reasonably safe purchase, and at the present price they return about £4 18s. per cent. Trust.—Transvaal Threes and Local Loans would suit for a yield of 3⅛ per cent.

Railways.

W. S. R.—I see no reason to worry over Central Londons. The 4 per cent. on the Deferred promises to be maintained, and at the current price the yield on the Deferred is close upon 4¾ per cent. There are few Home Railway stocks which bring in so much—at least stocks of such good standing. Barry Deferred gives just 5⅛ per cent., Great North of Scotland Deferred 5 per cent., and Taff Vales 5 1-16 per cent. North London Ordinary brings in nearly 4¾ per cent. on the basis of the last dividends, but this Company is suffering from the diversion of goods traffic and from the competition of the Great Northern and City tube, and I am not hopeful on the subject of a recovery of the ground lost. Buckle.—The Grand Trunk First Preference stock is safe for its full 5 per cent. for the year, and as I argue elsewhere in this issue, there is good reason for assuming that the Second Preference will receive similar treatment. X. X. X.—I prefer San Paulos to Leopoldinas. W., London.—The investment in North British stock is a good one, and I look for an advance in the price. You bought at a fair price, and the charges are normal. The yield will be nearly 4¼ per cent. Dividends have varied considerably; for 1903 the rate was 2 per cent. The highest price touched in recent years was 74¾ in August 1890, and the lowest 30 in July 1893. B. C. F., Turk's Island.—Atchison Preference stock is worth holding as an investment. Yorkshire.—The Grand Trunk Junior stocks are speculative favourites, and in the new year they ought (on this basis, coupled with some merit) to go higher, because the earnings will be going against poor figures in the early part of the current year. Canada is making rapid progress, and is good for great strides, which can hardly fail to be profitable to the Grand Trunk Company. But the coming opening up of a vast extent of rich agricultural country must surely count as an asset of much consequence. Yankee.—Mexican Central "B" Debentures ought to improve, especially with the country in a prosperous condition, and about to inaugurate a new currency policy which will be of immense benefit. Com. Trav.—1. It would be safer to wait until January. 2. I do not anticipate a new high record in prices. 3. Missouris, Eries, and Ontarios. 4. There is no regular rule in the matter.

Mines.

Cornishman.—The least hopeless are Otto's Kopje Diamonds and Fanti Consols, which might be held for a possible improvement, which, however, would be slight. Get rid of the others. S. B.—Libialas and Cape Coppers are worth keeping, but you have a considerable holding, and rather than buy more I suggest that you pay attention to one of the promising Kaffirs. The market is full of promising things—say Boksburgs, Barneys, Goerz, or General Mining and Finance. Cromwell Road.—The Premier Diamond splitting scheme provides for two Preference shares of 5s. each, entitled to a cumulative dividend of 250 per cent., and your Deferred shares of 2s. 6d. each in exchange for the existing shares. The reported amalgamation with the De Beers is declared on high authority to be devoid of foundation. Puzzled.—Your five Kaffirs should be good for a further advance between now and the early weeks of the new year. Kanya.—Kanyas may have some recovery if the activity in Rhodesians spreads to the whole market, but I have not a high opinion of the prospects of the Company. Globe and Phœnix are good to hold for some improvement. Oroya Brownhills are good for dividends and a probable improvement in price. Duncairn.—I do not think favourably of the reconstruction, and I advise you not to risk any more of your money. C. W. H.—I am obliged for your note on the subject of South African Territories. Medical.—South Rhodesia Goldfields shares are quoted at about 2s. 6d. The Company is not to be confounded with Rhodesia, Ltd. I am unable to say anything about its relation to the banket. Exeter.—Hold the Copper share for 2½, and the other for 4. Pilate.—Do not join the reconstruction. In due course you would almost of a certainty be asked for another assessment, and you have lost enough already. Ayr.—City and Suburbans might be kept for the dividends, and a higher range of quotations in the near future. The mine has a life of eighteen years or thereabouts. Lys.—The Company's prospects are fairly good, and the shares are worth holding on to. F. W. Foreman.—1. Sons of Gwalia and Kalgurlis would suit you. 2. Chartered might go soon to 5, but you already have a good profit, and ought not to be too greedy. Union.—Worth holding until Christmas or beyond, as the look of the market is better, and dealings are likely to increase. On an active market Barneys and Johnnies are both likely to go above 4. Veritatis.—1. The concern is reopening its doors this week, and you should receive your shares. 2. Meyer and Charltons, Knights and Casons. Louis.—Hold for 2, and then transfer into something more promising—say, one of the Eastern Rand shares. Blix.—Johannesburg Consolidated Investment shares make a promising speculation. They are not to be regarded as "a safe investment," but as a holding which gives dividends and (when bought with prices fairly low, as at present) promises an appreciation in values. A. M.—Rathbones and Mines and Minerals might be kept. I should not buy Northern Territories. Spero.—Randfontein at 4½, Johnnies at 4, Glencairns at 2, and Hendersons at 2. Rag.—Boksburgs are a fairly good share, and you ought to get out before long without loss—possibly even at a profit. Nemo.—Hold both the Kaffirs.

Mixed Investments.

Ignoramus, Poona.—1. I do not recommend dealings in Continental lottery bonds with Cunliffe, Russell, and Co. The bonds in which they specialise are genuine enough so far as they go, but these people charge about 40 per cent. above the market price. 2. Ottoman and Panama bonds are a fair gamble. They may be bought through the Crédit Lyonnais or through N. Keizer and Co., 29, Threadneedle-street, E.C. 3. There is no liability. 4. I do not care much for either of the shares named. I recommend Gas Light and Coke Ordinary stock, which will give you a yield of nearly 4½ per cent., and Westminster Electrics, which give over 5 per cent. 5. Gorringes might be kept. Punjaubi. 1. Hold the South Africans for better prices, but with the new money you might buy Goerz, Barneys, General Mining and Finance, and Welgedachts. 2. The money might be spread, as you suggest, over Gas Light and Cokes, Raphael Tuck Preference, and Westminster Electrics. 3. Brighton A is worth holding for the annual dividend. That, added to your profit through the appreciation of the stock, will give you a really good return. 4. I do not recommend dealings with the Universal Stock Exchange or any other firm of outside brokers. T. R., Peterhead.—1. See preceding reply. 2. I do not recommend the concern. 3. Angelo Deeps are promising. 4. They ought to go to 5 at least. 5. The carry-over charges are all right. Norwood.—1. I should keep Foreign and Colonial Investment Trust Deferred stock. 2. Buenos Ayres Western Ordinary stock is likely to go higher. 3. I should keep the Kirkstall Brewery Ordinary and (4) Preference shares. 5-8. These are all right. 9. I should get rid of the Honduras Government Railway shares. The country is absolutely hopeless. R. E., Midlands.—1. You might exchange into Grand Trunk Firsts, which are likely to go higher, and in the meantime will give you close upon 5 per cent. 2. Better sell the Oceana Developments and buy Rand Collieries, which are more in favour. 3. The North Charterlands should be sold. Veronique.—1. For the present at least. Buenos Ayres Rosario Ordinary and Preference might be held. 2. What Mexican Debentures do you refer to? 3. Sell the Costa Rica B bonds, which, I fear, are next door to hopeless. Hosein.—1. There would be no difficulty in obtaining payment if the agent were reliable. 2. Make the exchange into Gold Trusts and East Rands. 3. Pekin Syndicates have had a big rise, and would be too risky for you. 4. Vickers are worth buying in view of the good times which the armament Companies are now enjoying and also have in prospect. Ninety-Nine.—I do not care for British Westinghouse Preference shares, but the others are good to hold. Vox Populi.—1. I suggest Johannesburg Fours, Egyptian Unified, Chinese Fives, North-Western Railway Ordinary, Great Western Railway Ordinary, Great Central 1872 Convertible Preference, Canadian Pacific Preference, and Buenos Ayres Great Southern Preference. 2. I should retain Canadian Pacific Debentures. 3. Johannesburg Fours would make a judicious purchase if within the terms of the trust. Auckland.—It seems to me that Rhodesia Railway First Debentures, City of Mexico bonds, Calcutta Electric Supply, and Rio de Janeiro City Improvements Debentures make a fair selection for investment. I anticipate a material improvement in Great Central 1894 Preference within the next two or three years. Pilot.—1. Cordoba Central Income bonds might be held for a further improvement. 2. French Rands will probably move soon with other Kaffirs. 3. Likely to go better now that the Resolution is over and business conditions are normal. Pub.—I should recommend the Chinese Five per Cent. Gold bonds, Canadian Pacific Ordinary shares, and Argentine Great Western Cumulative Preference stock. Hutch.—All four securities are sound, and good to hold for investment.

Miscellaneous.

Preference.—You might hold on to Hope Bros. Preference, despite the bad showing, but with regard to the other concern, its condition is shaky, and you might realise. Oakham.—1. You will have seen by the papers that the concern has had to put up its shutters until certain monetary difficulties are surmounted, and further comment on your query is superfluous. 2. A fair speculation, but the future is inextricably mixed up with the future progress of Rhodesia. Colonial at Home.—I have frequently warned readers against dabbling in Cotton "futures," and especially at the instigation of the firm of "smart Yankees" alluded to. Z. E. O.—The depreciation in Brewery stocks is almost wholly attributable to the prevailing depression, and I think your holding is quite safe enough. Jaber.—Because they have a nasty habit of charging from 30 to 40 per cent. above the market prices for their specialties, I do not consider them at all reliable. The bonds themselves partake more of the nature of a lottery than an investment. Clubsteward.—The liquidator is entitled to throw out your proof in the circumstances. H. M. S., Rangoon.—You would be well advised to leave Cunliffe, Russell, and Co. alone. In the first place, the bonds do not possess any particular merit, and in the second you are grossly overcharged. Harold Dewhurst.—I believe it is a fairly sound institution. Vicment, Dublin.—A moderately good concern. Major.—I see no reason to recommend any dealings with the Investment Registry and Stock Exchange. Birch.—A very undesirable swindling establishment which ought to be avoided. Wanting to Know.—The concern seems to be working profitably with an expanding business, and to enable it to tide over its present difficulties you might take up the allotment. Warrington.—My opinion is that the Society is a highly undesirable one. Pingstone.—Discontinue payment and threaten proceedings if they refuse to refund your money. Augustus.—Currie and Crisp seem to be an offshoot of another notorious bucket-shop. They are energetic in circularising everybody who has a "suggestion" of wealth, and they ought to be left to their own devices to speculate with their own money. D. R., Leeds.—If my advice is to influence you in the matter you would not risk your savings in the concern, because it is fundamentally unsound. J. M.—A highly undesirable concern is the Army and Navy Dairy Company, and you ought to endeavour to get your money back. The mine mentioned is a fairly good spec. Windsor.—Hold on to what you possess for a while, but do not buy more. Taffy.—The concerns are all unreliable. If you want to speculate go to an inside broker and you may possibly be successful, but with any of the concerns mentioned your money will quickly vanish. L'argent.—I think you might hold for 25s. It is necessary to notify any change of address. No further liability is incurred. Sindbad.—So far as the central institution itself is concerned the Company is successful, I think, but the other hotels in the group are not profitable. The fresh capital has been secured. Anxious.—Yes, safe enough. Hales.—1. All your money is absolutely lost. 2. The Standard Oil Company, New York, is sufficient address. Swaffham. Many thanks for your thoughtfulness. Omnia.—All these concerns are of mushroom growth, and will burst sooner or later. To put your money into them would be extremely risky. There are thousands of better outlets for your savings. Kilcullen.—Not genuine by any means. El Capitan.—Do not take any notice of Stephens and Henderson's attractively got-up cotton-future circulars. Put your money into a bank. Nimrod.—Communicate with N. Keizer and Co., 29, Threadneedle-street, E.C., and they will enlighten you in regard to all details. Malacca.—The Nitrate shares are promising, and you might hold on. The combination of the producers is likely to be maintained. W. S. M.—I have dealt with them already. It is evident that one leading spirit guides the destinies of three of your bucket-shops. The silly sheep, strange to say, seem to delight in being slaughtered, notwithstanding that I have frequently pointed out the error of their ways. C. H. K. See foregoing answer to "W. S. M." Amused, Seacombe.—It is not without a touch of humour that one reads the Stephens and Henderson selected collection of eulogistic testimonials. Alpha.—Bradford Dyers' shares would suit. They yield 5¼ per cent., and the price will probably improve with the better conditions ruling in the textile trades.

Savoy Hotel & Restaurant, London.—The most beautiful garden and river view in Europe. The Restaurant of the world. Hotel rooms bright, fresh, and delightfully quiet.

MISCELLANEOUS MARKET QUIETLY FIRM—HUDSON'S BAYS THE FEATURE—TELEGRAPHS LESS ACTIVE—ARMAMENT SHARES FIRM—BREWERIES QUIET—RELAPSE IN CITY OF LONDONS—TRUST STILL BUOYANT—TEXTILES—LYONS EASIER—DOCK STOCKS—P. AND O. RESULTS SATISFACTORY—MEAT SHARES JUMP—LINOTYPE APPEAL.

The indications still point to a broadening out of business in this section, and, though the process is somewhat slow, and may not be accelerated before the turn of the year, it is still gratifying to see the small investors manifesting even a slight interest in their favourite market. The tendency, too, may be described as fairly satisfactory on the whole, and there has again been a strong demand for specialties, amongst which interest has been centred chiefly about Hudson's Bays, the shares creating another record in the matter of price by touching 52. As I have mentioned before, the carrying out of the Grand Trunk Railway Pacific scheme stimulates the buying, it being recognised that the line will open up an immense area of fertile land owned by the Company, and will naturally enhance its value. The Company owns about 5,800,000 acres of land in the fertile belt, which at the modest valuation of 30s. per acre ought to eventually bring in about £8,700,000, while the land in the vicinity of the trading posts are being disposed of profitably; and in addition, it must be remembered that the fur and store trade is worth approximately £100,000 a year. There has been some Canadian buying, though not on a very large scale, but towards the close the effect of profit-taking neutralises the earlier gains. Pekin Syndicate and Shansis have been less active, and though they displayed considerable strength, at one juncture they relapsed as a result of realisations. In the telegraph division there has been less animation, but, apart from Anglo-American Deferred, the tendency remains quite firm. Here is a table showing the yield on the better class of Telegraph stocks:—

	Price.	Yield per Cent.
Commercial Cable, $100	180	£4 9 0
Direct U.S. Cable, £20	11	5 9 0
Eastern Extension, £10	13½	6 4 6
Eastern Stock	134	6 4 6
Great Northern, £10	25½	5 5 0
Indo-European, £25	46	4 8 0
Western, £10	13½	5 8 6

Apart from armament descriptions, which continue to be bought on the strength of the better business which may possibly result from the war in the Far East, iron and steel shares have been quiet and without much feature. Dorman Longs continue to manifest a better appearance, and more business has come along for Harvey United, while Cammell Lairds improved. British Westinghouse relapsed on the passing of the dividend. In regard to Brewery stocks, very little change is discernible, the tone generally being somewhat more satisfactory in the absence of any widespread selling pressure. Watney, Combe, Reid issues are inclined to rally, and Ind, Coopes are tolerably steady, while J. W. Cameron stocks have come in for a little inquiry, which is reflected in the slightly higher values. But, on the other hand, City of London Brewery descriptions have shown decided weakness in consequence of heavy realisations, and indications of any recovery are still wanting. Trust stocks remain a cheerful spot, and there being little stock offering to offset the small stream of investment inquiries the tendency of prices is to improve, and chief amongst others which have made a little further headway I may mention Gas, Water, and General, Foreign and Colonial, London Scottish and American, as well as General and Commercial Trusts. Among Textiles, Fine Spinners have been in considerable request, picking up smartly, and Coats improved for the same reason—the prospect of cheap cotton with a record American harvest. Calico Printers and English Sewing Cottons remain firm without particular feature. In the "bunshop" class, Lyons, which were at first disposed to harden, relapsed sharply on the new Debenture issue, but they picked up slightly towards the close, the new Debenture stock being quoted at 2 premium. Aerated Breads, Slaters, and British Tea Tables are quietly steady. In the Traction group a small demand has sprung up for North Metropolitan Trams, which are slightly higher, but there has not been so much business passing in Road Cars or General Omnibus, though they maintain their ground tolerably well. British Electrics came on offer, while Anglo-Argentine and B.A. and Belgrano Trams made further progess. London and Indian Dock "A" and "B" Preference stocks have been in demand at the instance of investors, but the Deferred has see-sawed within narrow limits; otherwise this group has been devoid of interest. The P. and O. Steam Navigation report makes very satisfactory reading, the chief feature, perhaps, being the considerable advance in the profits from freight, due to the growing capacity of the fleet rather than to any increase in rates, and the coal bill, too, is more moderate than had been anticipated. The Company's Deferred stock advanced slightly on the strength of these results, but among other shipping descriptions Cunards are inclined to be dull, owing to uneasiness over the rate war settlement. Royal Mails continue weak, with sellers fairly numerous. One of the usual periodic spasms inseparable from the meat group has again been in evidence. James Nelsons and River Plate Meats were twisted higher only to relapse again practically to their previous level. Linotype descriptions have relapsed in consequence of the report not being regarded as satisfactory. The net trading profits for the year, after deducting £28,000 for reserves and depreciation, totalled £150,038, which, after providing for prior charges, etc., would enable the payment of 6 per cent. on the Cumulative Preference shares, though, in view of the state of the Company's finances, the Directors do not recommend any distribution. In an explanatory note it is said that "A" Debenture stock could not be placed on practicable terms, and, in view of the pressing necessity for more money, the Directors have formulated a proposal that every shareholder should purchase the unmarketed "A" Debenture stock in the proportion of one-sixth of the holding of shares at £82 per £100 stock. The payment for this is spread over six months in relatively easy instalments, and as good profits are being made and must improve with better times, it ought to be to the manifest interest of the Company that the requisite money should be forthcoming.

QUEER STORY.

KATHLEEN'S YOUNG MEN.

WILLIAM BELLEVILLE TUNKS, Esq., J.P., D.L., C.C., of Threadstone Hall, Cheshire, was a widower in middle life, with one child, a daughter, Kathleen.

The girl, you will perceive, had an Irish name. She was, in fact, called after her mother, who was a native of Tipperary, and had been gifted with all the wit, vivacity, and irresponsibility of her native land. How she had come to marry Tunks, the most solid, stolid, phlegmatic, matter-of-fact of English squires, was a puzzle to all who knew them both.

However, marry him she did, and lived very happily with him, too, though I fancy that he never quite understood her to the day of her death. She was always doing something strange, reckless, and inconsequent that baffled and bewildered him; and while he was warmly attached to her in his stolid way, he was never quite easy in his mind as to what might be her next prank. Only in this respect was a sense of security gained when, with much heartfelt grief, he laid her finally to rest in the family vault.

When that happened, the little Kathleen was about twelve years old, and, until she grew up, William Tunks enjoyed comparative peace. But upon her emerging from the schoolroom, with long frocks and rolled-up hair, the second edition of his troublous perplexities began. Kathleen proved to be the replica of her mother—only more pronounced. Beautiful to look upon, lithe and graceful beyond description, vivacious, witty, reckless, impulsive, harum-scarum, with the warmest of warm hearts and the most inconsequent of inconsequent natures, she was at once her stolid father's pride and despair.

His troubles were increased when young men began to run after Kathleen, as they soon did by the dozen. Small blame to them, either. Indeed, it was only in nature that any young fellow of spirit who saw this matchless creature should fall in love with her on the spot, and any who failed to do so deserved to be kicked for an insensate and callous wretch.

Kathleen encouraged them all, too—up to a certain point. She enjoyed being made love to, and it came natural to her to coquet. But when they spoke of marriage she "smiling put the question by."

"Oh, please don't be so terribly practical and prosaic. I don't want to marry any one at present. It will be time enough to talk of that in another ten years. What! 'May you hope?' Do you know you're the tenth man who has asked me that this week? I suppose you may. I don't know of any reason why you shouldn't. Oh, yes! Hope as much as you like. There are certainly twelve hoping at the present moment, and you will make the baker's dozen. Eh? You don't mean that? You want to hope all to yourself. Now, I call that very egotistic of you. I could not possibly encourage you in such selfishness. It's hardly Christian."

Thus she teased her many admirers, who talked, fretted, fumed, vowed that they would have nothing more to do with so heartless a girl, and next day were back at her feet as abject as ever.

But if Kathleen regarded her multitude of suitors with complacent unconcern, her father, William Tunks, found himself quite unable to follow her example. The fact was that these young men made his life a burden to him. They were always calling upon him, declaring their devotion for his daugther, requesting his permission to pay their addresses to her, and imploring him to use his influence with Kathleen in their behalf. The thing became a serious nuisance, and Tunks began to wish, with all his heart, that he were the parent of a less attractive and less coquettish daughter.

At length, one day, he spoke to Kathleen in tones of serious remonstrance.

"I must say I seriously disapprove of your behaviour, Kathleen. You encourage all these young men——"

"Oh, no, Daddy, dear! I do nothing of the kind. They run after me spontaneously, without any encouragement."

"It is not treating them fairly," continued Mr. Tunks, ignoring her disclaimer. "Why can't you send them about their business and have done with it?"

"Oh, that would break their hearts, poor things! You would not have me guilty of wholesale heart-smashing, would you, Dad?"

"Pooh!" said Mr. Tunks. "You are much more likely to break their hearts by keeping them dangling on in a fool's paradise, and buoying them up with false hopes, which, you know perfectly well, have not the least chance of realisation.

"I don't know that, Daddy. I might come to love one of them—some day."

"You can't come to love all of them, Kathleen."

"I'm not sure. It is quite possible. I have a large heart."

"Well, you can't marry them all, anyway."

"No, Daddy. That is true. I can only have one husband at a time—in the present state of the law. That is what makes selection so important and so difficult. It is like having twenty new hats sent you 'on appro.' when you can only afford one, and have to make that one do for the season. The moment you've made your choice and sent the other nineteen back to the milliner, you're sure to wish you had kept one of those nineteen instead. That's why I am so loth to fix my fancy upon any single admirer and to discard the rest. For I know that, when it's done, I shall feel mad with myself that I didn't choose one of the others. It's always the way."

"I do wish you wouldn't make fun of everything I say to you, Kathleen," replied William Tunks. "You are just like your poor mother."

"Ah!" cried Kathleen. "But she was more fortunately placed than I am. Her selection of a husband was rendered easy by the fact of her running up against you. If I could find your counterpart, you dear old thing, all my difficulties would be at an end. But, alas! that is impossible. You have no duplicates, you old darling," cried she, as she leant on the back of his chair and affectionately kissed the pink top of his bald head.

"Oh, yes; I dare say, Miss Blarney," answered her father, pleased with the flattery, nevertheless.

"I mean it, dear. I do, indeed. You are what Bob Morris calls a—a—— Let me see, what is it? a hapax—hapax—something or other; I forget the rest of it."

"Ah! a ἅπαξ λεγόμενον, I suppose you mean," said her father.

"Yes, that's it. It sounds very learned, doesn't it? But Bob Morris is a nailer at the classics. He has offered to teach me Latin; but I said, 'No, thanks.' The living languages are quite good enough for me. I have no desire to go delving in the graves of the defunct ones."

"Talking of Bob Morris," said William Tunks, "now I should really like you to come to an understanding with him, Kathleen. He is a capital fellow——"

"A well-meaning prig," she interposed.

"He comes of one of the oldest families in the shire."

"Yes; so old, that he has acquired quite a musty flavour. His moral aroma is that of a mouldy sixteenth-century book—interesting as a curio, but of somewhat oppressive odour at close quarters."

"His estates march with mine, Kathleen."

"His personal qualities do not march with mine, Dad. We have no single taste in common."

"Nor had your dear mother and I. Yet no married couple ever lived together more happily.

"But you did not marry her, Daddy, because grandfather's estates marched with yours?"

"Ahem! No, that is true. Your dear mother's father had no estates—at least, only Irish estates, which is the same thing. His tenants never paid him any rent, and he was too good-natured to press them. But if you would make a match of it with Bob Morris, now, and join his 7,000 acres to my 8,000, that would make 15,000 acres in a ring fence. Only think of that, Kathleen."

"Ah! Fifteen thousand acres in a ring fence is the end and aim of marriage, is it, father?"

"Nay! Not the end and aim, my dear, but a very desirable accessory," said William Tunks.

"I think I'd rather have a little more love and a trifle fewer acres," murmured Kathleen.

"But Morris loves you devotedly."

"That is so. Unfortunately, however, I do not love him."

"But surely, if you try, you can bring yourself to do so."

"I think not. Even if I were disposed to care for him—which I am not—the mere fact of feeling that he was the man whom I had got to love would at once make me hate him. To expect a girl to love best under such restrictions is like expecting a lark to sing his best in a cage. He can't do his song justice in a two-foot prison, nor can I do my affections justice within the limits of a ring fence. Even if you threw me in all Cheshire, I should not be contented. I must have the whole world to find my mate in."

"Ah! How unpractical you are—how high-flown! Just like your poor dear mother," said William Tunks, with a sigh. "If only you would try to think of that excellent fellow, Morris——"

"Well, Daddy—to please you—I will try to think of him."

"You will?" he cried, beginning to brighten up at her unexpected compliance.

"Yes, I will certainly think of him."

"That's my own daughter."

"But what the result of my reflections will be is another matter," said Kathleen, with a provoking smile, as she danced out of the room.

Nothing more was said on subjects matrimonial for some weeks. Then one night Kathleen went, under the chaperonage of an aunt, to a large ball in Chester. Next morning, at breakfast, her father asked her how she had enjoyed it.

"It was ripping," she said. "And, oh! Daddy, dear, I must tell you I have done it at last."

"Done what?" inquired William Tunks.

"Lost my heart," said Kathleen.

"Eh?" he exclaimed, anxiously. "Was Bob Morris there, then?"

"Oh, yes, he was there. But he is not one of the happy triplet."

"Happy triplet? What do you mean, Kathleen?"

"Let me explain. First of all, Charlie Rawstone, after dancing three dances with me, asked me, while we were sitting out the fourth, whether I loved him. It dawned upon me all in a moment that I did, and, in answer to his question, I felt bound to admit it."

"Kathleen! You have never promised to marry young Rawstone—a fellow with only £300 a year?" cried William Tunks, in horrified tones.

"No; I didn't promise to marry him. I only said that I loved him——"

"Don't quibble, Kathleen. It's the same thing. You had no business to tell him anything of the kind," fumed her angry father.

"He asked me a plain question, and I gave him a truthful answer. You wouldn't have had me tell him a lie, Dad, would you?" inquired Kathleen, artlessly shocked at the bare notion of such a thing.

"I won't consent," declared William Tunks, fuming and stamping.

"Well, he is coming to see you this morning, and you can settle with him then. . . . But I have ever so much more to tell you yet. Later on in the evening Dick Prendergast asked me the same question. I don't know how it was; but the conviction suddenly flashed across me that I loved Dick, too. And I confessed as much!"

"Kathleen! I do not regard this as at all a proper subject for jesting."

"I am not jesting, father. I am giving you an unvarnished account of what took place. Dick Prendergast will also call upon you this morning. He told me so, when he wished me good-night."

"Upon my word, Kathleen, if you have really behaved as you say—which I can hardly believe—your conduct is simply outrageous. To tell two men, on the same evening, that you loved them——"

"It was their fault for asking me," interposed Kathleen, in an ill-used voice. "I shouldn't have volunteered the information, if they hadn't demanded it."

"Pooh! Don't talk to me like that. It is impossible that you should love two men at once——"

"On the contrary, dear; I have found it possible to love three men at once. Towards the end of the evening, Jack Molleton asked me the self-same question, and, feeling that I did really love him also, I had no option but to answer in the affirmative. He is the third of the happy triplet; and he, too, will call upon you this morning.

"Kathleen—are you mad? Or are you only, after all, trying to play a senseless joke upon me?"

"No joke at all, father. It is the sober truth. All three did ask me whether I loved them, and to all three—as truth demanded—I answered 'Yes.' I said nothing about marrying any of them; though each appeared to assume it; and I had not the presence of mind, at the moment, to point out that the assumption was premature. So they all consider that I am engaged to them, and they will all come here this morning to ask your consent."

"Well, and having got yourself into this ridiculous mess, what do you propose to do now, miss?" demanded her father, with angry sarcasm.

"I propose, dear, to go out for the day, and leave you to deal with these three young men," said she, smiling at him serenely.

"You shall do nothing of the kind, Kathleen," he answered, energetically. "You have got yourself into the hobble, and you shall get yourself out of it."

"Oh! But, Daddy, you will manage it ever so much better than I shall."

"I tell you I decline to see them! I am not going to be made a perfect fool of. You must settle it with these young men yourself."

"I can't, Dad. I am too tender-hearted. I have not firmness enough to handle so difficult a situation. You must see them—you must, indeed."

"I won't, I tell you!" declared William Tunks, stamping his foot excitedly.

"Then no one will see them," answered Kathleen; "for I shall certainly not be in the way when they arrive. Goodness me! A quarter to ten! And Charlie Rawstone will be here at the hour. Ta-ta, Daddy dearest! See you again at dinner," said she, kissing her hand to him gaily, as she tripped out of the room.

A moment later the hall door had banged behind her, and William Tunks, feeling very hot and angry, and looking extremely blank, saw his mad-cap daughter careering swiftly on her bicycle down the drive.

"She's beyond everything," he muttered. "Don't seem to think she's done anything unusual or outrageous either. Says 'Yes' to three men on the same evening, and then coolly shoulders the whole responsibility of her mad freak on to me, and leaves me to settle with the idiots she has befooled. I won't see them, though. I'm jolly well d——d if I will. . . . The devil! Here's some one riding up the drive now. It's that young ass, Rawstone."

He rose excitedly from his chair and gave a violent tug at the bell. The butler answered it.

"Brett, if any gentlemen call this morning, I'm not at home."

"Very good, sir."

"And if they ask when they can see me, say I shan't be at home all day."

"Very good, sir."

At that moment, the front-door bell pealed loudly. William Tunks shuddered.

"There's some one there now, Brett," he said, with a pale, agitated face. "Mind you say what I've told you."

"Very good, sir."

And Brett departed, looking rather puzzled. Was the governor going off his chump? Or was it that he had got into money difficulties and was expecting duns? He sincerely hoped not, for the place suited him very well; although, of course, as a self-respecting butler, he could not possibly remain in a family where there were financial inconveniences.

Presently he returned, bringing Mr. Charles Rawstone's card on a salver.

"Mr. Rawstone left this for you, sir, and said he was very sorry to miss you, but would call again to-morrow morning. I was to say that he wished to see you very partic'lar, sir."

"Ah! Thank you, Brett."

Not ten minutes afterwards, the front-door bell pealed again. It resulted in Brett's bringing in another card bearing the inscription, "Mr. Richard Prendergast."

"Mr. Prendergast left this for you, sir. He said he was sorry not to find you in, as he wished to see you on important business. He will call again to-morrow morning, sir."

"Confound him!" muttered William Tunks, under his breath.

He took up his Times and tried to read it, but could not concentrate his attention on it for two sentences together. His ear was all the while on the alert for that third peal at the front-door bell, which he knew could not be long delayed.

Soon it came—ting, tang! ting, tang!—loud, strident, insistent; and although William Tunks was expecting it, it made him jump. Shortly afterwards Brett again appeared with another card.

"Mr. Molleton left this, sir. I was to give you his compliments, and say how sorry he was to miss you, his business being of a most pressing nature, sir. And he will call again to-morrow morning."

"D——n!" muttered Tunks. And if ever a Cheshire squire meant "d——n," William Bellville Tunks, Esq., of Threadstone Hall, J.P., D.L., C.C., meant it then.

* * * * *

Kathleen, true to her word, did not put in an appearance again until dinner-time. Then, when the servants had at length withdrawn, she asked her father, with a bright, interested smile:

"Well, Daddy darling, how did you get on with them?"

"I did not get on with them at all," answered her father, with a displeased frown; "I declined to see them."

"Oh, but, Daddy dearest," cried Kathleen, in disappointed tones, "that is really too bad of you. I felt quite sure that by the time I returned this evening you would have arranged matters for me and settled which of the three was to be the happy man. And now I find nothing whatever done, but things in precisely the same muddle as I left them. I do call it most unkind of you."

"Well, of all the unreasonable——"

"What's the good of a father," continued Kathleen, with an injured pout, "if he can't arrange a little matter like this for you? Daddy, you must settle which of the three I am to marry."

"Pish! I don't want you to marry any of them. They are none of them a match for you."

"Ah, but I must marry one of them. It would be too humiliating to have had and accepted three offers, and then for none of them to eventuate. If you won't say 'which' for me, I shall say 'which' for myself; and, in that case, I think I shall single out Charlie Rawstone."

"I say, for Heaven's sake, don't marry Rawstone! He has only £300 a year," cried Tunks, in alarmed tones, for he knew that his reckless, harum-scarum daughter was quite capable of carrying out her mad threat in the impulse of the moment.

"Dick Prendergast, then?"

"Kathleen, don't be idiotic! A younger son, with nothing but his allowance of £400. You might as well commit suicide at once."

"Charlie Rawstone no go! Dick Prendergast—no go!" said she, checking them off calmly on the tips of her fingers. "Well, then, only Jack Molleton remains. I don't quite know what Jack's income is. But you seem to be very well up in these things. Perhaps you can tell me."

"Molleton has £1,500 a year. He is more eligible than either of the other two. But even he is no match for you, Kathleen——"

"Now, it is no use your saying that, Dad, at this stage of the proceedings," she interrupted him, "when you yourself, by eliminating Charlie Rawstone and Dick Prendergast, have narrowed the choice down to Jack Molleton."

"Nothing of the sort. I forbid Molleton, too."

"Father! This is ridiculous! You are merely arguing in a circle, and have brought things round to where they were at the start. Under these circumstances only one course is open to me. I wash my hands of the whole concern. You shall see these three young men and have it out with them yourself."

She spoke with resolution. This was clearly no idle threat. William Tunks thought of that triple interview to-morrow morning, and his heart misgave him, for he was a shy and nervous man. Even if he were "not at home" again when they called, he could not go on dodging them for ever. They would run him to earth sooner or later. And then——

"Kathleen," he cried, excitedly, "you must write to those three young men by to-night's post."

"What is the good of my writing, if I have nothing definite to write?"

"You have something definite to write. You must reject them all."

"Impossible, Dad! I am not going to make myself a public laughing-stock by falling between three spoons—I mean stools. Marry one of them I must for my own credit. It is only on these terms that I will consent to put pen to paper."

From this position she would not budge, until at length:

"You are exactly like your poor mother. D——n it all! let it be Molleton, then," cried William Tunks, in sheer desperation.

* * * * *

So Kathleen got her way, and married, with her father's consent, the man whom she loved, by the unconscious aid of Charlie Rawstone and Dick Prendergast. I think she could have gained her point by direct methods, but this indirect method of forcing her father's hand by encouraging two other suitors of detrimental quality to propose, and so rendering Molleton relatively eligible, was the method that appealed to the madcap Irish girl as at once the most humorous and the most effective.

MUSIC.

GLUCK REDIVIVUS.

DECIDEDLY the most interesting event of the past week has been the revival of Gluck's "Alceste" by the students of the Royal College of Music. All are aware of the position which this famous work occupies in the history of opera, and certainly it was quite uncommonly interesting to have the chance of hearing it actually performed. No doubt it would be possible to exaggerate the importance of Gluck's reforms, or at least to misunderstand their character. As Mr. Ernest Newman has pointed out in his brilliant book, "Gluck and the Opera," they did not amount to quite so much as has sometimes been supposed. Although Bach had lived and died when "Alceste" was composed and its preface written, curious views were still held even by the most "advanced" musicians of that time as to the relative importance of music and poetry in the case of opera. "I sought to reduce music to its true function," wrote Gluck, "that of supporting the poetry"—which was certainly giving music a good deal less than its due from the standpoint of a later kind of music-drama. But this by no means prevented Gluck from writing in "Orfeo," "Alceste," and the two "Iphigénies" such music as up to that time had never been known in opera in respect of its independent beauty and impressiveness. After all, the great thing was, not the theory, but the result, and in this respect Gluck must be reckoned perhaps a greater reformer even than Wagner. Nor did he lack his portion of opposition and contumely either. Like Wagner, Gluck was accused of crude harmonies, incoherent modulations, tuneless melodies, noisy orchestration, of injuring his singers' voices, and Heaven knows what else. Such charges sound incredible enough to latter-day hearers of his music, but they were undoubtedly laid at his door, and it is instructive to remember it.

At the same time, the criticism which his works excited is in some respects quite easily understood. It was almost a new art which Gluck offered his hearers—something different, not only in degree, but almost in kind, from that to which they had been accustomed. No wonder, therefore, that those who had come to look on opera as nothing but a string of effective airs, in which their favourite vocalists could display their powers, combined with dancing and spectacle, protested when Gluck set before them such vastly different fare. Save that the two things were both called opera and sung on the stage with scenery and costumes, there was hardly anything in common between "Alceste," "Orfeo," and others of Gluck's greatest works, and such operas as those which they displaced. In other words, Gluck found opera a dreary and fatuous convention, the butt and byword of all thinking men for its multitudinous absurdities; he left it a living art possessed of the noblest possibilities, only the least of which, perhaps, have yet been realised. It is a striking commentary upon the condition of opera in this country that until last week "Alceste" had never been heard in London. Is it too much to hope that now that the students of the Royal College of Music have given it a friendly lead, Covent Garden may perchance feel disposed to follow suit? That the work gave the greatest enjoyment to its hearers last week admitted of no doubt. Why should it prove less attractive if mounted at Covent Garden? "Orfeo," with Giulia Ravogli in the title-part, was, of course, quite a drawing card for a certain period during Augustus Harris's régime. The same great artist would make an incomparable Alcestis if the syndicate would provide the requisite opportunity.

The performance by the students was exceedingly creditable. Miss Nannie Tout, who distinguished herself last year as Fidelio, did excellently again as Alcestis. Mr. B. I. Davies lacked the inches of the ideal Admetus, but had the right conception of the part, and sang at times with real power; while Mr. F. G. Johnson as the High Priest and Death, Mr. J. H. Foster as Heracles and the Oracle, and Mr. F. C. S. Carey as the Herald and Apollo, were others who did all credit to themselves and to their teachers. If there was ground for criticism at all it was, indeed, in respect of a matter beyond the control of either pupils or masters—to wit, the actual quality of the raw material, so to speak, revealed by the voices which were heard. While giving every praise to the excellence of the performance, who could lay hand on heart and say that the standard of either voices or vocalism was what it might be? Doubtless the explanation is not very difficult to find. If we had native opera there would be no lack of native opera singers. There is no reason to suppose that the land of Sims Reeves and Santley and Patey and Clara Butt is any less richly endowed in the matter of fine voices than France or Germany or any other country. The trouble is that, as matters stand, they are simply not discovered and brought to light. Possibly matters are just a shade better in this respect to-day than they were in former years. If Covent Garden offers yet small inducements to the average British student, there are, at any rate, the Moody-Manners, Carl Rosa, and other organisations always on the look-out for such talent as may be available. Still, the fact remains that in the output of operatic artists at present we make a sadly poor show. If that long-desired National Opera were founded to-morrow, the English-speaking singers available to man it would be hopelessly inadequate.

Among recent concerts the most interesting perhaps has been that of the London Choral Society on Monday evening, when Dr. Walford Davies's setting of the old morality play, "Everyman," which made such a hit at the Leeds Festival in October, was given for the first time in London. It is undoubtedly a most clever and impressive piece of work, quite the strongest thing which Dr. Davies has done in the way of original composition so far. Now and again, suggestions of Elgar are noticeable, but for the most part the music has a character all its own, while its prevailing solemnity is gratefully relieved by such more vivacious numbers as the "Appeal to Riches" and the chorus embodying the protestations of Kindred and Fellowship. The work should be heard again, and might well be given at the Albert Hall. An interesting concert of an entirely different order was that announced for Tuesday evening (too late for notice this week), in the shape of the first Chamber Music Concert given under the terms of the Palmer Fund. For this concert some sixty odd compositions were, it seems, received, out of which works by Messrs. W. Y. Hurlstone, Frank Bridge, A. E. T. Bax, F. C. S. Carey, Percy H. Miles, Paul Corder, John B. McEwen, and George Dyson were chosen for performance. Chamber music of an earlier date was heard at the last Broadwood concert, when a number of old English madrigals were given among other things by an excellent choir from Leeds, under the direction of Mr. H. A. Fricker.

In the way of oratorio music, the Royal Society of Musicians celebrated its 166th anniversary with a capital performance of "Elijah" by the London Choral Society, with Miss Agnes Nicholls, Miss Giulia Ravogli, Mr. William Green, and Mr. Ffrangcon Davies as the principal soloists; while "Hiawatha" has been repeated once again by the Royal Choral Society. Then, of course, there were the usual St. Andrew's Day concerts—Master Florizel von Reuter contributing to the programme of that given at the Albert Hall. At the Ballad Concert on Saturday, a new song cycle, "Dream Fairies," words by Mr. Edward Teschemacher, music by Mr. Franco Leoni, found considerable favour as given by Mme. Suzanne Adams, Miss Muriel Foster, Mr. Ben Davies, and Mr. Kennerley Rumford. Some music of interest was also heard at the second of the Barns-Phillips chamber concerts, given the same afternoon, including among other things a group of songs (the best of 387!—what were the worst like?), called forth by Mr. Phillips's recent competition; while Miss Katharine Saunders, a débutante possessed of a very fresh and pleasing voice, which she uses with skill and taste, made a decidedly pleasing impression in songs by Haydn and others.

As regards forthcoming concerts, M. Maurel's vocal recital on Saturday, when he will be heard in some of the most famous numbers of his operatic répertoire should draw a big audience, despite the counter attraction of the Symphony Concert at Queen's Hall. Saturday, indeed, will offer an embarrassing variety of attractions, since Busoni is playing also on that afternoon at the Curtius Club Concert.

One hundred years ago yesterday (December 6) was born, as an interesting article in the Musical Times for December reminds us, one of the greatest of latter-day prime donne—to wit, the incomparable Schröder-Devrient, whose name will always live in the records of the opera, if only by reason of her connection with Wagner's earlier works. But it was, of course, in such parts as Fidelio, Agathe, and the Queen of the Night that she had, previous to this, won fame, though Chorley, as usual, mixed a good deal of vinegar with the honey of his praise of her when she first came to London. It was Schröder-Devrient who told Wagner, with the true assurance of a prima donna: "You are a man of genius, but you write such eccentric stuff it is hardly possible to sing it." This was in relation to the Venus of his "Tannhäuser," which she created in 1845; and others of her recorded sayings revealed a considerable sense of humour. Thus as Ardriano in "Rienzi," when instructed to sit "brooding" at one point, she called out to Wagner at rehearsal: "Very well; but what am I to hatch?" On another occasion, in "Fidelio," when Florestan was slow in accepting the crust of bread which she offered him, she whispered, sotto voce: "Why don't you take it? Do you want it buttered?"—a passage which the audience under the spell of her art in that pathetic scene certainly little suspected.

Yet is there not a suggestion always of the fabulous about the records of these great singers of the past? Take that passage from the Neue Zeitschrift, for instance, quoted in the article already named:—

> In this rôle the Devrient surpassed herself in originality; the effect was extraordinary, the audience turned first hot, then cold, for intensity of emotion.

We have our great singers nowadays, yet do they ever produce such effects as this? Does a Covent Garden audience ever grow hot and cold by turn? If not, why? Is it the singers or their hearers who have changed? Or was it merely a flight of imagination on the critic's part? The latter alternative is perhaps the more probable. It is always in the past that these musical miracles are accomplished—never in our own day.

Mme. Calvé is the most unfortunate of artists. Last year she was accidentally poisoned by taking an overdose of aconite. Now she is laid up at Vienna, and there is talk of an operation for appendicitis—though all will hope that her condition may have been exaggerated. A less serious misadventure which befell her not so long since was to get a drenching from a fire-hose, which had been turned on by a zealous theatre official in America to quench the undue ardour of her admirers. But even these ills are nothing to those with which rumour has persistently credited one whose life was despaired of years ago, if all that was said about her can be trusted. Happily Mme. Calvé has lived to belie these evil-omened croakings, and all will join in wishing her a speedy recovery from the attack which has now laid her low.

So Richter is not to conduct a series of provincial performances of "The Ring" for the Moody-Manners Company. It was a sufficiently improbable suggestion, but Dr. Richter has thought it worthy of formal contradiction. This is to say nothing, however, against the project in connection with which the rumour started. In view of the great success with which the Sheffield experiment seems to have been attended, Mr. Manners, who is nothing if not ambitious, may well be entertaining a bigger scheme on similar lines, such as this suggested production of "The Ring" at a dozen or more of the great provincial centres under arrangements similar to those adopted in the case of the Sheffield fortnight. Nor, given a little enthusiasm and organisation, should the thing be incapable of fulfilment. The situation is very simple. On the one hand is Mr. Manners with his company and his plant; on the other you have your provincial music-lovers thirsting for that which, under existing conditions, it does not pay to provide. To such Mr. Manners says: "Guarantee my expenses, and I will give you your 'Ring.'" What need stand in the way? Meanwhile, it is satisfactory to learn that there is every probability of the tetralogy being given again at Covent Garden next season, with Dr. Richter once more at the head of affairs.

Draughts at Covent Garden are a new complaint—chiefly, no doubt, because we ordinarily get our opera in the summer; the recent Arctic weather has, however, proved our only Opera-house anything but immaculate in this regard—though, doubtless, there is force in the managerial reply that vast sums have been laid out in the attempt to render its ventilation perfect. Unfortunately this is no guarantee that that desirable result will be attained. The fact is, of course, that the proper ventilation of a public building is one of the most difficult problems in existence. Certainly few of our concert halls or theatres are free from reproach in this respect.

How the draughts of St. James's Hall used to be grumbled at is ancient history. At Queen's Hall, on the other hand, the complaint is all the other way, since there a little more fresh air even in the form of draughts would often enough be welcome. It is, indeed, deplorable that the ventilation of our principal concert hall should be so sadly defective. To sit out a well-attended concert here on a mild day is almost to court asphyxiation. In the stalls the thing is not so noticeable, but if you happen to be seated in the grand circle or, worse still, in the balcony, the atmosphere is at times well-nigh unendurable. At the Bechstein Hall the ventilation is better, while the quiet and artistic decorative scheme is also in happy contrast here with those dreadful "stucco twiddlings" of Langham-place. But drawbacks of other kinds are not lacking. A gangway down the middle of the hall is one thing badly needed, while, if the rearmost rows of seats were raised (as at the Steinway Hall), the comfort of those who occupy them would certainly be greatly increased. As it is, the floor being quite flat from back to front, one can often hardly catch a sight of the performers from the back rows.

The financial result of the last Leeds Festival, the report of which has just been published, can hardly be regarded as very satisfactory. Although the expenses were less by nearly £800 than in 1901, the profits were only £304, as against £1,651 made in 1901—the sum being the smallest amount realised by a long way in the whole history of the Festival. The profits of the first festival, in 1858, exceeded £2,000, and those of the succeeding meetings have seldom fallen below that sum, while they have more than once exceeded it. This was the case in 1880, when Sir Arthur Sullivan conducted for the first time, and the sum of £2,330 was realised, and again in 1889—the record festival in this respect—when the profits amounted to £3,142. Certainly, beside such figures as these, the sum of £304 obtained this year makes a poor show, and it is obvious from the report that, but for the fortunate saving effected in expenses, the Festival would, for the first time in its history, have resulted in a loss. The report ascribes the result to the depression of trade.

LETTERS ON BOOKS.

MY DEAR MR. WYNDHAM,—Last week I endeavoured to give you the results of my survey of the publishers' efforts to supply the rabid requirements of youth for adventure, and I have no doubt that you will have no difficulty in selecting from the books I mentioned volumes to suit the taste of any of your young friends who are still in their teens. But there remains a still more youthful audience, whom the publishers show themselves fully as anxious to cater for, and thus it happens that directly I managed to emerge from the sea of adventure into which I had plunged at your bidding, I found myself confronted with the necessity of embarking upon the exploration of another wonderland dear to the artist and teller of stories at this season of the year. Fortunately there is no lack of adequate guides to this imaginative realm. What, for instance, could serve as a more charming guide-book to Fairyland than Mrs. Chisholm's volume (1) illustrated so daintily by Miss Cameron in colours? Or, as a guide, who could prove more trustworthy than the faithful Grimm garbed in a new and attractive uniform by Messrs. Blackie (2). Mr. Andrew Lang, too, may always be depended upon to lead his young readers into pleasant places, and in spite of the array of gold and blue and red fairy books which he has gathered together, it is clear that he has not yet exhausted the world's supply of fairy lore. For "The Brown Fairy Book" (3) he has drawn on the folk-lore of many of the savage nations of the earth, and the stories which have delighted and frightened the Red Indian, the aboriginal Australian, and the Kaffir youngsters are here reproduced for the benefit of the child of the decadent white man. Then, amongst those whose imagination is capable of inventing a new and complete fairyland, who can be more certain of a welcome than Mrs. Nesbit? Indeed, I am not quite sure that the story of "The Phœnix and the Carpet" (4) does not deserve to be the most popular children's story of the year, for the adventures of the family of children who are blessed with the possession of the wonderful bird and wonderful carpet, are told with just the happy knack of realism which enables the child to follow them with thrilling interest. Then there is Mrs. Alfred Baldwin's budget of stories about giants and princesses, and other inhabitants of fairydom (5), which is certain to be warmly welcomed in the nursery, and not the less by reason of the pictures by Mr. Charles Pears which illustrate the text. Mr. Laurence Housman is another of the generous band of writers who give the children of their best both with pen and pencil, and the volume to which the first story "The Blue Moon" (6) gives its title, is a very charming specimen of his art. Stories and illustrations of the daintiest are also to be found in "The Golden Heart" (7), though this by no means exhausts the choice. Miss Klein elects to take her little readers to the fairyland beneath the seas, and Mr. Patten Wilson visualises her fancies with very delicate grace (8). Mr. S. Ashton and Miss Dorothy Furniss also collaborate with pen and pencil in telling the adventures of a little girl, who, through finding the key to Davy Jones's Locker, is enabled to explore the country of the sea fairies. Then Mr. Farrow has added yet another to his Wallypug stories, and the adventures of "The Wallypug in Fog-Land" (9) makes fully as amusing reading as any of the series. Another favourite author who is practically certain of a hearty welcome has given us "Wally Wanderoon" (10). The pen of the creator of Brer Rabbit, Brer Fox, and their companions has lost nothing of its cunning, and the volume of tales told by Wally's wonderful story-telling machine concludes with a new story of Brer Rabbit and the Bee as delightful as anything Mr. Harris has ever written.

Nearly all the before-mentioned books are admirably illustrated, and, indeed, one of the features of the Christmas literature of the present year is the extent to which colour printing is used for the adornment of children's books. The finest example of the book-beautiful I have seen, however, is the work which Mrs. Stanhope Forbes has produced. "King Arthur's Wood" (11) is more than a mere fairy story for children, more than a repetition of the old-time romance of Sir Gareth and the lady of the Castle Perilous from the Morte d'Arthur. It sustains its charm to be considered as a work of art, and part of the credit for the satisfactory result is undoubtedly due to the printer, who, by printing the blocks upon a dull surface paper, has succeeded in attaining the closest fidelity to the technique of the artist, both in the reproduction of the water colour and charcoal drawings. Finally, before leaving the domain of fairyland, let me commend to you "The Odd Fancies of Gwen" (12). Both letterpress and drawings reveal evidence that the young authoress is gifted with a very real imaginative faculty. Already, though still in her teens, Miss Forwood's work compares favourably with that of many of her older rivals for children's favour, and this volume leads one to the conclusion that the promise of her first book, published last year, is likely to be amply fulfilled.

In other directions illustrations play just as important a part in the books for children as in the fairy books. I hardly know whether the "Pilgrim's Progress" (13) is properly described as a children's book, though with Mr. Byam Shaw's pictures, fine in colour and feeling, it makes a covetable volume. "Uncle Tom's Cabin" (14) is another of the books which have ascended to the nursery, and in the reprint illustrated by Mr. Vedder is certain of a welcome. "Gulliver's Travels" (15) also only gain from the youngster's point of view by reason of the full-page pictures in colours with which Mr. De la Bere has adorned the volume. Turning from these reprints of old favourites to stories retold in terms suitable for children's comprehension, Mr. Crockett is to the fore with a volume of stories which he humbly acknowledges to be "stolen from the Treasure Chest of the Wizard of the North" (16). He justifies his literary piracy with the expression of the desire that his action may send every reader and listener to Scott himself, and if the youthful lover of romance needs such prompting to go to the fountain head, Mr. Crockett supplies it. Another delightful rendering of the old-time stories is to be found in "Tales of the Canterbury Pilgrims" (17), rendered in easy prose and delightfully illustrated by Mr. Hugh Thomson's dainty drawings, while Shakespeare is laid under contribution by Miss Hoffman for a series of charming little booklets (18). Romance of to-day is the keynote of another book which Mrs. Nesbit has produced for the delectation of the youthful reader, and I see no reason to doubt that the doings of these "New Treasure Seekers" (19) will not prove to the full as exciting as the adventures of their predecessors. It is just the sort of book which, read aloud, will keep all the little inhabitants of the nursery absolutely quiet during the dullest, wettest afternoon of the whole Christmas holidays. Need I say more in its commendation? For the same purpose the "Animal Autobiographies" (20) which Messrs. A. and C. Black are publishing should also prove effective. Two of these handsome volumes are before me. In one, Mr. G. E. Mitton gives the life history of a Skye terrier with a dash of the retriever in him; in the other Mr. Hewett relates the life and adventures of a rat. Both are full of incident and well written, besides being adequately illustrated by bright colour-plates, and for the child lover of animals no gift could more effectually secure a welcome. Another pleasing volume for the budding naturalist is the book about birds, illustrated by 120 photographs from nature, which Mr. Kearton has called "The Adventures of Cock Robin" (21).

So far the books which I have introduced to your notice have been mainly those in which the pictures have been merely pendants to the text, but there are still a number remaining in which the reverse holds good—the picture books, nursery rhymes, and alphabets designed for the amusement of the smaller inhabitants of the nursery. And here again there is no lack of choice. There is "The King of the Beasts" (Blackie, 3s. 6d.), ably pictured by Mr. Carton Moore Park, together with all the other animals who lay claim to sovereignty. The coronation does not follow the accepted tradition, as may be gathered from the final couplet of the illustrative rhyme:—

> For many examples in History are found,
> Of very big Asses who come to be crowned.

Still remaining amongst the animals, Commander Peary's volume, "Snowland Folk" (Gardner, Darton, and Co., 6s.) is true, novel, and amusing, and its pictures of bears, Esquimo, and other denizens of the north lose nothing of their interest by reason of their reality. Or, again, there is a wealth of humour in Mr. Milson's pictures of "Jolly Jumbo" (Blackie, 3s. 6d.). Thoroughly amusing, too, are "The Twins" (Nelson), as pictured by Mr. Hassall and described by Mr. Shirley, and the same may be said for the adventures of James O'Flame in the world of sport, as depicted by Mr. Alan Wright. Perhaps the verse in this "Comic Sport and Pastime" (Skeffington, 5s.) is a little beyond the range of even the precocious infants of to-day, but certainly the pictures will be a joy to them. But for real rollicking humour which cannot but appeal to young and old alike there is nothing to touch the volume which recounts the adventures of "Buster Brown" (Chambers, 3s. 6d.). Buster first made his appearance in the pages of the New York Herald, and made so great an impression upon laughter-loving Yankees that he created quite a sensation, and Buster neck-ties, Buster footwear, and Buster overalls became the rage in fashionable circles in New York and Chicago nurseries. Another picture-book which especially appeals to the nursery is Miss Gotch's "Tuffy and the Merboo" (Brimley, Johnson, 6s.). The quaint drawings of the Boobirds have just the drollery which delights the children. Mr. Hassall, too, knows exactly how to make attractive pictures for little eyes, and "The Old Nursery Stories and Rhymes" (Blackie, 3s. 6d.) which he has chosen to illustrate is bound to be immensely popular. Amongst the annuals again there is to be found an immense store of interesting material for making dull days pass pleasantly. "Chatterbox" (Gardner, Darton, and Co., 3s.) is so old a favourite that it scarcely needs notice. "Blackie's Children's Annual" (3s. 6d.) and Ward, Lock, and Co.'s "Wonder Book" are both comparatively new-comers, but their bright stories and brilliant illustrations should suffice to find them a ready welcome. Cassell and Co, in this department, make a successful bid for favour with "Little Folks," "Bo-Peep," and "Tiny Tots," and further with "The Little Folks' Adventure Book" (3s. 6d.) have added one more desirable volume to the prolific output of the season.—Believe me, my dear Mr. Wyndham, ever yours very sincerely, DESMOND B. O'BRIEN.

GIRLS' GOSSIP.

DEAREST AMY,—No sooner had we got out all our warm garments for the bitterly cold and frosty weather than it took its departure, and gave place to weather so mild and pleasant that all the little bushes in the squares thought spring had come, and put out their baby bourgeons. Dear little shiny leaves, so fresh and unspotted by the world, it seems hard that they should be shrivelled and blackened before long by the bitter breath of winter. In nature, superfluous effort induces punishment, not reward.

I promised to tell you about Lady Henry Somerset's address at a drawing-room meeting last Monday. It was held in a pretty drawing-room in Park-street, which belongs to a lady, Mrs. Streatfeild, who always sends in a great number of Truth dolls. The voice of a tiny fountain in a window was a curiously fascinating item of the proceedings. When I first noticed it, I thought it was a little bird soliloquising in a faint, soft voice. The room was well filled, and Lady Henry told us very interesting things about her Industrial Farm Colony for inebriate women at Duxhurst, near Reigate. Started ten years ago in a small way, it has grown, and succeeded, and vindicated itself. Her friends said, "How are you going to build walls to keep the women in?" But kindness and consideration are far better than walls. The unfortunate beings are brought back gently from the dreadful ways of drink, and outdoor occupation is one of the principal factors in their redemption. Another strong one is found in the children at the Birds' Nest, part of the colony where little ones are sent by the Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Children. The women soon begin to love the children, and to feel their sweet, restraining influence. The young things about the farm, too, being dependent on their care, make the poor creatures feel that something in the world needs them and watches for them. The proportion of the cured cases is 65 per cent., a contrast to the results in State reformatories, where both men and women are taken. The fallacy that women can never be cured of drinking habits has been completely refuted. One woman, who had been convicted of drunkenness about two hundred times, and was known as "the terror of Holloway," turned out, under treatment at Duxhurst, a gentle, kindly, willing creature, liked by all. Unfortunately, they were unable to keep her at the Home after she had remained there the full year. Other and pressing cases were waiting for admission, so the poor "terror of Holloway," though begging and praying to be allowed to stay, had to be turned out in a scornful world. She never relapsed, but her long years of drunkenness had ruined her health, and not long after she died.

Funds are very much wanted, as some of the women are too poor to pay much. The good work ought to be extended. There is a home for ladies which is self supporting, and the farm produce is an asset, besides the needlework done by the women. Contributions should be sent to Miss Mary C. Gorham, S. Eanswythe's Cottage, Tonbridge.

The second dance for the Gordon Hospital was a great success. In fact, the dancers complained of the crowd, and particularly of a way it had of surging up into one corner when there was far more room everywhere else. There was some pretty dancing. A little Spanish-looking girl, wearing brown and gold, with flowers à la Japonaise in her hair, danced every dance from start to finish, and enjoyed every step of them. A tall, distinguished-looking woman in a jet "coat-of-mail" also danced beautifully with a partner taller than herself. A lady with very splendid pearls was in black and pale blue. A magnificent blonde wore black velvet swathed round her fine figure. It is not often that one sees really beautifully moulded shoulders as white as they are well-shaped. These balls are managed capably, and are doing really good work for an excellent charity. The third and last of the series takes place on Monday next. The hours are nine till one, a Cinderella and what the Scotch call "a bit."

The Exhibition and Sale of Irish Industries at Newcastle this week (Wednesday and Thursday) is to be a social function in its way. Half a score of countesses, with a due proportion of marchionesses and a whole flock of ladies of lesser title, are to take part in the vending. It is good and kind-hearted of them, for selling is weary work. Buyers are very shy birds, and as the nets are spread in their very sight it is not an easy matter to bring off a sale. And then the crowd, and noise, and heat—oh, they are good, and deserve the warmest of Hibernian blessings! Have you ever heard of this curious one: "May ivery hair of your head turn to a pound of candles to light your sowl to glory"?

When we give a copper coin to a crossing-sweeper we call it buying penny blessings, and owing to the rich quality of the London mud of late we have purchased quite a large number. The blessings of the London crossing-sweepers are a study in themselves. They are a literature. Linda, who has no children and does not wish for any, was so annoyed one day when one of her douceurs elicited a fervent prayer that she might be blessed with a "large and handsome family."

I wonder why theatre managers do not adopt the very simple plan of printing on the tickets, if not the name of the play, at least the time of the performance? It would save much trouble and confusion, and it really seems so obvious that one wonders why everybody did not think of it, rather than why nobody ever did. The Duke of York's management has adopted this plan during Miss Robson's season, and it is to be hoped that English managers will follow suit. Another thing—why do not the theatres advertise the prices of their seats in the "amusements" column of the daily Press? There are slight variations of price in many houses, but the nearest place where one can find particulars of these is at the box-office or an agency. In the case of the suburban theatres, at popular prices, it is extraordinary that so politic an insertion has not long ago commended itself to the proprietors.

I am sending you by this post a copy of a book in which I had some hand, the Peri Lusia Handbook, and also by this post I am sending one to the ladies of the household of the Ameer of Afghanistan. Mrs. Daly, in her book about them, says that they are all quite busy, and take a great interest in knitting, embroidery, and crochet, and that they even cut out their children's clothes and stitch them together in the sewing-machine. What a different picture from that which Lalla Rookh paints in the mind! The modern development of the harem is no doubt eminently useful and practical and praiseworthy, but what about romance?

The book, as you will see, gives many designs in all kinds of fancy work in the beautiful Peri-lusta thread, which has all the brilliance of silk at a very much lower cost. If you want to embroider a dress trimming, glance at the title-page and see how well the soft colours work in with each other. Minna has just embroidered a white linen blouse for herself after the design on p. 76, and dear little Marion has finished a perfectly sweet tea-table cloth in drawn work like that on p. 59. Do say what you think of the book, as I am rather inclined to be proud of it! I delight in fancy work, but seldom have any time for it.

There is an Exhibition of beautiful embroideries going on at Debenham and Freebody's. Many of the specimens date from the Tudor period, when "petit point" or small-stitch work began. There is no mistaking embroidery of this period, for the Tudor rose is almost invariably introduced, in company with its enemy the caterpillar and its not very improving visitor the butterfly. Stuart embroidery is distinguished by designs raised in relief, and spangles were introduced to brighten the already bright colours of the stitchery. In the days of Queen Anne, wool was introduced among the silks, and human hair was also used in the designs. It had to be plucked freshly from the head, or it would have lost its gloss. The faces have been painted in upon some of these pieces, and it is said that great painters occasionally used their finished art in this way to embellish the embroidery of their friends.

The samplers are almost painfully interesting, considering the tender years of some of the executants. The sampler appears to have been a peculiarly British institution. It does not appear among the superb collection of foreign embroideries, Italian, Spanish, Turkish, much of which has been made up into cushions and other articles suitable for presents. A fascinating addition to the usual exhibition is a section devoted to old paste, very fine in workmanship. So are the old-fashioned bead purses and reticules, in which our great grandmothers carried their money and their handkerchiefs. These, with old lace, fill up a fast-fleeting hour at the well-known house in Wigmore-street.

In order to emphasise the fact that all their goods are made in Paris, the London Corset Co., of 28, New Bond-street, send to customers who apply for it a pretty white and silver box, with a draped Venus of Milo on the lid, and containing a stereoscope and several views of Paris, a corner of the Champs Elysées, a bit of a busy boulevard, the Rue St. Honoré, showing the Magasins du Louvre, the Place de la Concorde, the lake in the Bois, the Rue de Rivoli, and many other places of honour and renown, interspersed with views of the workshops in Bond-street. All the slides are postcards.

What would a house be without handsome glass and china? This thought occurred to me when sauntering through the acres of both in Goode's of South Audley-street. Present-hunting is easy enough here, where you can get dinner-services ranging from a couple of sovereigns up to charges that you may reckon from the fact that a single plate costs £22 10s. These are painted by Alcock, each design illustrating a thought of one of our English poets. The colours are so fascinating that choice becomes a little difficult. I notice that almost all the specimen plates of the dinner-services chosen by royalties have a plain white ground. In the next section long tables shone and scintillated with rainbow tints from every possible shape and size of cut glass. And another table was covered with beautiful Worcester. Tall white lamps and vases with a brilliant gloss upon them are admirable for the reason that they lift high their burden of light and flowers so that merely a slender pillar intervenes between vis-à-vis at table. A whole roomful of the quaint and brightly-coloured Wemyss ware contrasted with the delicate tints elsewhere. I think it was in this room that I noticed a very large and handsome pair of jardinières in deep-toned oxydized bronze, ornamented with beautifully-modelled fruit and foliage. The size is 18 in. high, and 24 in. in diameter. They are unique and very cheap, and would look well in the great hall of some country house.

There are many small things for presents, including the long, narrow trays with coffee-cups, tea-sets, of every kind, tea-tables, bi-metal spirit-lamps and stands, candelabra in every kind of handsome china, tables with a deep well, sectioned out for plate (a capital idea!), china caskets, boxes, and inkstands, silver boxes, lacquer boxes, old china bowls for pot-pourri, and dainty little dessert knives with painted china handles in cases.

After seeing all the magnificent vases, some of them 8 ft. high, and other splendid ornaments, I found my way to the kitchen goods, and confirmed my own impression that Goode's is the cheapest place in London to buy the French marmites and casseroles. Their copper heaters for the table are eloquent of comfortable hot breakfasts and suppers. The bi-metal, made of copper and pure sheet silver, always tempts me; it looks so pretty. I always want to cook something in the tiny bouchée moulds. The beauty of bi-metal is that even the most fastidious cannot object to food being served in the dishes in which they were cooked, and though the cost of the utensils is rather high initially, yet they make for economy in the end, being practically indestructible and never needing re-silvering.

We remain faithful to Jaeger, and always believe that our immunity from colds all through the winter is chiefly due to these soft and warm garments, and the luxurious Jaeger blankets, combined with open bedroom windows! We go twice a year to their Regent-street depot—once in spring to get nice, fresh, light things for summer wear, and again in winter to provide against the chills of the season. More than anywhere else do we find the union of softness and lightness with warmth and comfort. It is carried to a fine art. The two-guinea camel-hair shawl could be passed through a curtain ring, yet one of these serves us as a blanket, whenever we go abroad, being as warm as it is light. And you know how thick and over-ample the Continental blanket is.

Apropos of shawls, there is a knitted one in the case that is a copy of one presented to Queen Alexandra on her marriage. It is really and actually like a cob-web, and the design is as clear and definite as that of a spider's web. This took the worker, now an old lady, six months to accomplish. It is much finer than lace, and looks as if Titania and the ladies of her fairy court had woven it. The Jaeger blouses are beautifully cut, and many are embroidered in delicate colours. One has red berries and green leaves, another peacocks' eye feathers, so fashionable just now. Jerseys in every colour, whether white, blue, crimson, green, or grey, are in some cases hand-knitted and in every instance daintily finished, and the little knitted open coats are to be had in white, red, or blue. The new petticoats, just in, are in cloth with a deep flounce in alternate lines of satin and strong black net. They are black, grey, crimson, and so on, and are agreeably inexpensive. So are the spencers made of goats' hair, so fine that they can be crushed quite small in the hand, and the dressing-gowns in all degrees of thickness or thinness. One in mauve with a pale mauve silk collar could not have weighed more than a pound and a half. The children's things look so pretty, fine, and dainty. For them, as for grown-ups, Jaeger boots and shoes are the only warm ones warranted to prevent chilblains. They are as soft, light, and comfortable as the other things.

Christie's to see the Anglesey jewels. Our friends who did so are eloquent on the subject, and they all finish their remarks with the indignant observation, "And all wasted on a man!" Eva says that she saw some of the artificial jewels used for the theatrical performances, and that she never beheld any lovelier designs. I have often said that more attention and art are given to the designs of imitation jewels than to the general run of real ones. I am sending you the catalogue of the Parisian Diamond Company, knowing how many presents you choose therein for your friends every year, and you will notice this perfection and grace of design in the pieces. The setting alone is a marvel. You should study the earrings particularly, as there is a great feeling in favour of these very becoming ornaments. You cannot judge from the illustrations of the sparkle and grace of those which have three stones set dangling one below the other—either two diamonds and a pearl, or all diamonds. Pear-shaped drops are always fashionable, and so are the solitaires, in any stones. Emeralds are most becoming to the complexion when drooping from the ears, and as for small Creole hoops of tiny diamonds, they are the daintiest and most becoming of all.

Something quite new is the stiff alternation of jewels seen in buckles, etc. Six rubies together, then six diamonds, and so on. There is quite a rage for this at present, but its novelty is its chief advantage. We were shown a pretty square buckle of open-work trellis in the company's famous diamonds, each intersection of the trellis being marked by a square emerald. Jewelled ornaments are sold for evening shoes also, being worked on with gold thread very effectively. In pendants there is a bewildering choice, but chiefly did we love a sacred Egyptian ibis, whose body was one shell of pearl, his wings being of green enamel studded with emeralds, and his crest of emeralds. He hung sideways from a chain of gold and pearl and a blue enamel loop, and the delightfully unconventional and artistic angle of his body was balanced by two sapphire drops falling from gold and pearl chains, caught in his finely-modelled claws. A certain neatness of outline seems to indicate a reaction from the "new art" patterns, and there is a great revival of antique designs copied with modern lightness, the settings being invisible and the centres flexible. You would love the refinement of a delicate golden trellis held with diamonds, through which chiffon or velvet can be run to form a most charming neck-band.

I see that the Strolling Players are to give a performance of "Liberty Hall" at the Court Theatre on Friday evening of this week in aid of the funds of the Ladies' Association of the Metropolitan Hospital, Kingsland-road. Tickets can be obtained from the Chairman, Mrs. Jesser Coope, 7, Eccleston-square, S.W.

One of the morning papers last week boldly affirmed that the Christmas card was falling into disfavour. It would be interesting to know how the writer arrived at this conclusion. All the evidence seems to point in the opposite direction, for it may safely be assumed that the leading firms engaged in the production of greeting cards would not put forth an increased supply, as they have done, if there were really any signs of a lessened demand. Messrs. Raphael Tuck and Sons, for instance, have beaten all their previous records by issuing something like 3,500 entirely new designs. More important than the quantity is the artistic quality of the cards, and in this respect also the collection is an advance even upon the former splendid achievements of this well-known firm. There are so many beautiful and novel cards, in such a wide range of styles and processes, that it would be impossible to single out any for special reference without feeling that others equally noteworthy had been passed over. Perhaps it will be better, therefore, to say comprehensively that people of the most fastidious and the most diverse tastes cannot fail to find both cards and calendars to their liking in the productions of Raphael House.

Under the title, "For the Empire," Messrs. Hills and Co., Limited, have published a series of Christmas cards and calendars deserving of high praise alike for their artistic designs and their excellent colour-printing. It is pleasing to know that they have all been entirely produced in London, for the results are distinctly creditable to British workmanship. Besides a quantity of charming Christmas cards and calendars, Messrs. C. W. Faulkner and Co. issue many series of picture postcards, and also a number of ingenious and diverting games which will be popular with children.

Did you see the puzzling picture in the Westminster last week of a delighted party of seven playing some new and evidently exciting card game? Beyond the mysterious legend, "The Pit(t) Club: Latest Phase," there was nothing to show what it all meant, though obviously an advertisement. "Pit" is the title of the game, which is a Yankee invention based on the idea of the transactions in the corn exchange at Chicago, familiarly known as the "wheat pit." You play the game with cards bearing the words, "wheat," "oats," "barley," and so on, and the object is to get into your hand "by trading" all the cards of any one kind, so that you can declare a "corner in wheat," or whatever it may be that you have secured. The points scored vary for different "corners," and if the game is played in the proper spirit, the fun is fast and furious. "Pit" has the advantage of being playable by any number of persons from three to seven.

It was a happy thought of the editor of Pears' Annual to make a special feature of "Christmas Days with Charles Dickens." Nobody ever wrote so delightfully about the festive season as the great novelist, and it is pleasant to have gathered together the most striking Christmassy passages from his stories, with admirably executed reproductions in colour of the illustrations by "Phiz" and John Leech which adorned the early editions of "Pickwick" and "A Christmas Carol." There are also extracts from "The Chimes" and "The Holly Tree Inn," with illustrations in colour by Charles Green and Frank Dadd; and in addition to this feature the annual, which is an amazingly good sixpennyworth, is accompanied by three finely printed coloured presentation plates.

Clare sends me the following from Dublin:—

DEAREST MADGE,—Once December begins Christmas is practically with us, for better, for worse, for enjoyment or worry. Just as we choose to take it, there it is, but take it we must. The festival enters into all our arrangements and engagements, into everything that we do or leave undone; it fills our thoughts, and in many ways rules our lives, whether we will or not. The best philosophy of life teaches us to take cheerfully whatever we have to take, and no doubt the teaching is very applicable to Christmas. At the same time many of the circumstances of Christmas make it extremely creditable to us when we can exhibit a sufficient amount of cheerfulness to pass muster on the occasion. For one thing, our obligations are generally so much in excess of our powers of fulfilling them. For another, it is at best of times hard to come up to our own expectations, but the difficulty is as nothing compared to that of coming up to the expectations of others at the season of gifts and "tips." If only one could be a millionaire at Christmas, how delightful it would be—so helpful, so simplifying! Unfortunately it is generally quite otherwise with most of us. Is it not one of the least pleasing features of Christmas to bring before our minds in a most ruthless way the limitations of our incomes? At other times we go our ways, forgetting there are many things we fain would have and cannot have; we fain would do for others but cannot do. At Christmas this happy forgetfulness is broken in on; our memories are lighted up; in fact, as they say over here, "the whole discovery is found out."

Our shops are very attractive at this season although not magnificent like yours; still they are up to date, and have all the novelties which tempt the fickle mind. What an art the setting out of shop windows has become, demanding artistic knowledge in the execution of the work. Some goods must be very trying to the artistic temperament. Who can make anything satisfactory out of boots, umbrellas, and various other things of stiffness and utility?

THE MORNING CONSTITUTIONAL.—Attractive Short Skirt Costumes, substantial for all weathers, yet smart for wearing in Town, are made by FRED. BOSWORTH, 9, New Burlington-st., W.

Lord and Lady Dudley returned to Dublin at the end of last week, having finished their first holiday of the year. They rejoined their family at the Viceregal Lodge. Lady Dudley generally does a good deal of Christmas shopping in Dublin. The season is a very busy one for Viceroyalty as for Royalty. So many gifts to be given, so much charity to be dispensed — in fact, Christmas in high place is the most acute of all the Christmases. This week Lord and Lady Dudley are paying their long-arranged visit to the North, but not a long one. Belfast and Newry have both been busy with their bazaars. The Dowager Lady Dufferin has been foremost in working for Belfast, whilst Lord and Lady Kilmorey and Sir John and Lady Ross of Bladensburg, have been actively promoting the charitable work for the Newry Hospital. One wonders at the number of bazaars and sales, or, rather, to think that they are made to pay. The purse of charity is apparently a miraculous and inexhaustible one. Society is having as yet a specially dull time in Dublin, and little improvement is expected with regard to entertainments in the evening until after Christmas. Last week Lady Grosvenor gave an "at home" in the afternoon at the Arts and Crafts Exhibition, which has been mainly got up by Lord and Lady Mayo. Lady Fingall also gave one at the same place during the week, at which Lord and Lady Dudley were present. Entertainments of this kind have lately become much the fashion over here. They are specially interesting at picture exhibitions, a picture gallery being so suitable as a mise en scène for a Society entertainment. During the week Lady MacDonnell, the Under Secretary's wife, gave an afternoon tea at the Royal Hibernian Academy, where an exhibition of pictures by modern artists, presented to Dublin, is being held.

Lord and Lady Ardilaun were at St. Anne's last week. The arrangements about the Prince of Wales's visit to Ashford are necessarily liable to change and cannot be definitely fixed. The woodcock shooting is usually at its best after Christmas, Lord Ardilaun's annual shooting parties being held in January as a general rule. Ashford is a fine residence, with all the comforts of modernity, in the West, the old country of the Celt, which still retains its atmosphere of old history and Celticism—a country in which one may still see poetry and mystery to lift up the soul, in mountain, wood, and water, and not only "economic" possibilities and the water power for commercial enterprise. One whispers to oneself sometimes that modern progress may after all be a retrograde movement, an "advance to the rear," to put it Irishways, a concentration of energy on the bread by which man alone cannot live. Who can tell? We stand in the midst of problems, of which the variety of solutions is infinite. "It's a quare world!" as a certain Irish doctor on an ocean ship used to say with a sigh at the end of a day spent in the amenities of flirtation in absolute neglect of medical duties. We find it a "quare world," don't we, each in our own way?—Yours ever, CLARE.

Quail à la Normande offers yet another way of preparing these inviting birds:—

Fill four boned quail with chicken forcemeat that has been mixed with minced foie gras and chopped truffle. Tie strips of buttered paper round the birds and braise them with stock and vegetables for an hour. When the birds are cold, cut them in halves, lengthways, and coat the round side with tomato aspic; put on each a star of hard boiled white of egg. Dish them on a border of aspic, fill the centre with cube-shaped pieces of cold boiled new potatoes and asparagus points, all mixed with oil, vinegar, salt, and pepper, and put chopped jelly round them. For the tomato aspic:—Reduce a tin of passed tomato purée very stiffly, and mix it with 3 gills of aspic jelly; use it when on the point of setting.

Charlotte à la crême de Chataignes is a pretty sweet:—

Whip the whites of three fresh eggs very stiffly, mix in 6oz. of icing and castor sugar (previously mixed in equal proportions), and 1oz. of desiccated cocoanut. Put the méringue into a paper cornet and press it on to oiled paper in finger-shaped pieces, not more than three inches long, mix 2oz. of cocoanut with 2oz. of icing sugar, and with it sprinkle them quickly and lightly, then dry them in the oven for some hours. Line a charlotte mould with oiled paper, arrange the strips of méringue in an upright form round the sides of the mould, using a little icing to make them adhere to each other, place the mould in the screen or a cool oven to dry. To serve, turn it out on a fancy paper, fill it with the following cream, and sprinkle it with desiccated cocoanut:—

For the cream:—Scald and remove the skins from twenty-five chestnuts, boil them until they are the consistency of floury potato, then rub them through a wire sieve. Mix the purée with half a pint of custard, a gill and half of whipped cream flavoured with maraschino, and then freeze it in the usual way.

Ever your loving cousin, MADGE.

ENTRE NOUS.

AT THE ALBERT HALL.—A CHRISTMAS APPEAL.

December 14 and 15, 1904.

CAN London show a sight more fair than this—
This shrine of Charity where Pity's hand
Has built a bridge across that deep abyss
Dividing rich and poor throughout our land:
A bridge o'er which, in answer to the sighs
Of Sorrow's all-too-long-neglected host,
Hope, of the buoyant heart and star-like eyes,
Can carry help where it is needed most.

Gaze on the picture! 'Tis a pleasant sight
To see this Hall, where Wealth oft tastes its joys, Transformed into a Temple of Delight
For London's poorest little girls and boys—
To see the Toys that everywhere abound,
As, at each glance, new vistas are revealed;
To mark the blaze of colour all around
Where countless dolls hold the chromatic field!

But there are other scenes we would recall—
Sad scenes beyond the frowning Workhouse gate,
Where little of Life's sun can ever fall,
And where, with wistful eyes, the children wait.
They've heard glad rumours of the goodly times
Which they, if Fate be kind to them, may share.
And so they listen for the Christmas chimes,
Now buoyed by hope, now saddened by despair!

For as a fact their lot at Yule depends
On that which you may be prepared to do;
Since every day the lengthy list extends
Of those who look for happiness to you.
Yes; you it is their future must decide,
And whether, on the coming Christmas Day,
Any of those for whom we would provide Must, after all, unnoticed, go their way.

Then, look again, and you will see, not far
From where a glimpse of Fairyland we gain,
The long dim Wards where tiny sufferers are,
Moaning, alas! with rarely ceasing pain.
These also watch, for they have also heard
Of the glad visit Santa Claus may pay,
And to their broken sleep the nurse's word
Brings dreams that fainter grow at dawn of day.

For there is just a chance—poor little tots!—
That by some grim omission, after all,
The longed-for visitor may pass their cots,
Deaf, it would seem to their pathetic call.
And often through the hours of weary pain,
When for the solace of your love they yearn,
Their faith, unable to withstand the strain,
Into depressing doubt is apt to turn.

You must decide their fate, and if you 'd make Each tiny patient's Yuletide one of joy,
With you it rests the needed steps to take—
To send to every waiting waif a toy;
So that, with no restrictions to impede,
Truth's List of presents may be so compiled
That, 'mongst the little ones for whom we plead,
There shall not be one sad, forgotten child!

Not one pale face, with tear-dimmed, wistful eyes,
To haunt your festive hearth; not one sad sigh
To mar the carols that may heavenward rise,
Whilst the clear joy-bells echo to the sky.
Oh, no! 'Twill rather be your joyful task
To scatter yet more happiness around,
To do the little that from you we ask,
And make the Christmas chimes more sweetly sound.

'Twill mean at most a doll or so the less
For girls already sated with such joys;
One plaything, drawn from some rich child's excess,
To charm a workhouse boy, unblessed with toys.

One toy the less! how little that implies
For those whose life is passed 'midst brighter scenes!
But for the waif who, sick and weary lies,
Who shall compute how very much it means!

But passing great as the delight may be
Of those t'wards whom your kindness is displayed,
More happy yet 's the lot the Fates decree
For those who to the helpless carry aid.
For this remains unaltered by repeal,
This, often tested, has all tests withstood—
Of all the luxuries that man can feel,
The sweetest one is that of doing good!

My readers are all aware, I hope, that the Truth Doll and Toy Show at the Royal Albert Hall is open to-day (Wednesday) and to-morrow. I trust that as many as possible will avail themselves of this opportunity of seeing the splendid collection of dolls and toys provided for the amusement of the children in the London hospitals, workhouses, and workhouse schools during the coming Christmas season. It may be convenient to mention again that the Show will be open each day from 10.30 a.m. to 9 p.m., and that the charge for admission before 5.30 p.m. will be 1s. After that time to-day (Wednesday) the charge will be sixpence, and on Thursday evening admission will be free. I would also call attention to the fact that collecting-boxes will be provided in the Hall for the convenience of those who have not as yet found themselves able to send their contributions to this office. I trust that all who visit the Show will avail themselves of this convenience.

Messrs. Callard and Bowser, of Duke's-road, Euston-road, have very kindly sent me forty-two boxes of their butter-scotch for distribution in connection with the Toy Show, and I have again received from Messrs. Fry and Sons, of Bristol, two cases of their chocolate for the same purpose.

I am compelled, much against my will, to call attention again to the unsatisfactory position of the Toy Fund. Though a certain number of my readers continue to respond most liberally to the appeals already made, they are only a very small minority. Unless a much larger number comes to the rescue during the next week, the Fund will close this year with a heavy deficit, and next year's Toy Show will start with a serious handicap. I still venture to hope that this calamity will be averted, but it will only be by every reader of the paper and every visitor to the Toy Show giving practical help between now and Christmas.

Do readers of Truth appreciate that for want of more general support the usefulness of the Toy Fund is seriously curtailed? I can hardly think they do, and I therefore invite them to look at the following letter just received:—

Dear Sir,—May I ask you to consider our small hospital, which is inclined to be overlooked in regard to toys?

We have forty-five to fifty beds for children, some from very poor parts.

We should welcome a visit from any of your staff. We get full grants from Hospital Saturday and Sunday Funds, and our expenditure for collecting and office expenses is practically nil.

This is merely a sample of letters that are reaching me every day at this time of year from outlying quarters of London. To my regret, I am obliged to tell the writer that it will be impossible to find any toys this year for his fifty children, though obviously the hospital is a very deserving one. The same answer will have to be given in many other cases. Though more toys have been provided for this year's distribution than the public seems disposed to pay for, there are still not enough to go round. What is more, if the Toy Fund ends this year in debt, there is a prospect of the number of disappointed children being still further increased in future. Is it necessary to say more? I can only leave the facts to speak for themselves.

I have received the following amounts in response to my appeal of last week:—

T. Walmesley, £10; Archie, Maud, and Vera, £2 2s.; A. W. B., £1; H. C. M., £2; E. D., 5s.; Lord Durham, £5; C. F., £20; Mrs. J. D. Brown and friends, 10s. 6d.; Gerald, 10s.; Mrs. Mumm, £2 2s.; A. A. The King and Queen, who are on a visit to Lord and Lady Cadogan at Culford Hall, near Bury St. Edmunds, will return to Buckingham Palace on Saturday, and are to stay in town until the middle of next week, when they will proceed to Sandringham for the Christmas holidays. The last shooting party of the season at Sandringham will assemble at the Hall on Monday, the 26th, or Tuesday, the 27th. The King and Queen are to leave Sandringham on Monday, January 2, on a visit to the Duke and Duchess of Devonshire at Chatsworth, where they will stay until Saturday, the 7th, when their Majesties are going to Windsor Castle for a residence of about four weeks. Prince and Princess Louis of Battenberg, the Duke and Duchess of Fife, and Count Albert Mensdorff will spend Christmas at Sandringham.

The King was last week on a visit to Lord and Lady Farquhar at Castle Rising, near Lynn, where the house party included Lord and Lady Mar and Kellie, Lord

Stanley and Lady Alice Stanley, Lord Henry Vane-Tempest, Sir T. Kelly-Kenny, Mrs. George Keppel, and Mr. Somerville Gurney, besides the two Equerries-in-Waiting upon His Majesty. The King went shooting at Riffley on Wednesday, and at Royden Fen on Thursday afternoon, and in the home covers on Friday morning, but the weather was very unfavourable on all three days. His Majesty will very likely drive over to Castle Rising for another day's pheasant shooting in the preserves rented by Lord Farquhar during his next stay at Sandringham.

The King of Portugal's visit to Welbeck Abbey was most successful. His Majesty went pheasant shooting on the first day of his stay, and the second day was devoted to partridge driving, which he preferred to a suggested excursion round the district of "the Dukeries" in a motor-car. Before leaving Welbeck on Friday King Carlos drove to Hunciecroft and inspected the Duke of Portland's famous breeding stud, when St. Simon and the other sires were paraded.

The Prince and Princess of Wales were last week the guests of Lord and Lady Ilchester from Tuesday until Saturday at Melbury Park, where the house party included the Duke and Duchess of Marlborough, Lord and Lady Powis, Lord and Lady Crewe, Mr. Walter and Lady Evelyn Guinness, Lord Stavordale and Lady Helen Stavordale, and Captain and Lady Muriel Digby. There was shooting in the park preserves on Wednesday, and Thursday was spent at Abbotsbury, Lord Ilchester's place on the coast, where there was driving for wild fowl, an inspection of the Swannery and the Abbey ruins, and a luncheon in the beautiful sub-tropical gardens of the castle. On Friday there was shooting in the woods in the morning, and in the afternoon at Bubbdown, from which there is one of the finest views in Dorsetshire.

H.R.H. and the Princess are to return to Marlborough House on Friday from visiting Lord and Lady Pembroke at Wilton, and on Monday evening they will leave town on a two days' visit to Lord and Lady Mount Stephen at Brocket Hall, Hertfordshire. The Prince and Princess of Wales are to spend the Christmas holidays at York Cottage, Sandringham.

The visit of the Prince of Wales to Ireland has been postponed until the last week in January, in order that H.R.H. may be present at the Lord-Lieutenant's first Levee and Drawing-room, which are to be held at Dublin Castle on Tuesday, January 31, and Wednesday, February 1 respectively. The Prince of Wales will leave Windsor for Dublin on Monday, January 23, and H.R.H. is to proceed direct to Ashford, Lord Ardilaun's place in Connemara, where he will have three or four days' shooting. Ashford is the best estate in Ireland for woodcock. The Princess of Wales will remain at Frogmore while the Prince is in Ireland, and they are to arrive at Marlborough House for the season on Friday, February 3.

Prince and Princess Christian, who have been staying for a week at Schomburg House, will spend the Christmas holidays at Cumberland Lodge, where they will be joined by their son, Prince Albert of Schleswig-Holstein, from Berlin.

Princess Louise and the Duke of Argyll were last week on a visit to Lord and Lady Londonderry at Wynyard Park, County Durham, where they arrived on Tuesday from Edinburgh, en route for Roseneath House, Dumbartonshire. Lord and Lady Londonderry will leave Wynyard about the 28th to spend a few weeks at Mount Stewart, their seat near Belfast, where they will probably receive a brief visit from the Prince of Wales towards the end of next month.

Princess Beatrice and her daughter, Princess Ena, who have been staying for several weeks at Kensington Palace, are to leave town on Friday for the Isle of Wight, and they will reside until about the middle of January at Osborne Cottage. Princess Beatrice will leave England about the end of January, or early in February, to spend a couple of months in Egypt.

The paragraph in a contemporary last week about the dispute between the Duke of Saxe-Coburg-Gotha and the Government of the Duchy is a strange farrago of nonsense. This journal considers that only prejudice could cause any one "to deny the right of the Duke to a voice in the disposal of the Royal lands and domains." The writer evidently knows nothing whatever about the matter. "The Royal lands and domains" to which reference is made were national property until about 1855, when it was decreed for special reasons to transfer them to the reigning Duke as a temporary arrangement. When the crisis had passed, Duke Ernest most unjustifiably refused to return the estates to the Diet, and his relations with his subjects were never afterwards cordial. Duke Alfred followed his uncle's example. A few months ago Herr Hartig, the Minister of State, brought in a Bill to regulate the question of these estates, which was unanimously passed by the Diet. The Regent of the Duchies, the Hereditary Prince of Hohenlohe-Langenburg, declined to assent to this measure because Duke Charles Edward comes of age next July, and the Regent was of the opinion that the future ruler should decide the question for himself. My contemporary absurdly eulogises "the great tact" of the young Duke, who has in reality done nothing except intimate that he does not approve of the measure which has been passed by the Diet. Herr Hartig, who has resigned his post, is a very able man, and a great favourite with the Emperor William, and he is believed to be destined to fill a high office in the Imperial Government at Berlin. There is a firm and universal determination in Saxe-Coburg-Gotha to carry out the arrangement indicated in the late Minister's Bill, which is most liberal in its treatment of the reigning Duke. This journal's prediction that the Duke will transfer to the State one-half of the Royal lands, "as an act of grace," is rubbish. If this is done the Duke will merely carry out the provisions of Herr Hartig's very generous measure, which gives him half the Crown estates, and an annuity of £15,000 a year.

Unless Duke Charles Edward meets the Diet in an amicable and liberal spirit, it is expected that the King will privately intervene, as the affairs of the Duchy of Saxe-Coburg-Gotha are a matter of considerable concern to the Court. Prince Arthur of Connaught is at present the next heir to the Duchy, and if the reigning Duke and Prince Arthur both died without leaving male issue, the throne would pass to the second son of the Prince of Wales.

It was announced in Truth recently that Countess Lonyay (the Princess Stephanie of Belgium, widow of the Archduke Rudolph) and her husband are coming to England for the winter, and that they will be joined in this country by her sister, the Princess Louise of Saxe-Coburg-Gotha. Count and Countess Lonyay, who left Prague last week for Vienna, on their way to Paris, have taken Adsdean, Mr. Tennant's charming place in West Sussex, for a few months. The statement, which is going round the Press that Count and Countess Lonyay "are going to take up their residence in England" is not exactly correct, as they are merely coming to this country for a few months.

The Irish Viceregal arrangements were changed last week suddenly owing to the illness of Mr. John Ward. Lord and Lady Dudley left Mourne Park, where they were staying with Lord and Lady Kilmorey, direct for England. During the week it was officially announced in Dublin that the Prince of Wales would pay a visit to Lord and Lady Dudley on the occasion of his being in Ireland for the woodcock shooting at Ashford, near Cong, Lord Ardilaun's fine residence in the county of Galway. Lord Ardilaun's is generally considered the best woodcock shooting in Ireland.

Mr. Douglas Close Richmond is to resign the office of Comptroller and Auditor-General at the end of the month, when he will retire from the Civil Service. The salary is £2,000 a year, and the place is in the gift of the Prime Minister.

Lord Hobhouse belonged to an old Somersetshire family, and his father was for many years Permanent Under Secretary at the Home Office. He was educated at Eton and Balliol, where he was a contemporary of Lord Coleridge, Jowett, and other distinguished men, and he took the highest classical honours in 1840. Having been called to the Bar, he soon obtained a large and lucrative practice as a conveyancer and equity draughtsman, and he became an intimate friend of Roundell Palmer and Hugh Cairns. Lord Hobhouse's health failed when he was in the full tide of work, and he then did good service as a Charity Commissioner, and as an Endowed Schools Commissioner, and afterwards as legal member of the Viceroy's Council in India, where he spent five years. After having served for some years as a member of the Judical Committee of the Privy Council he was raised to the peerage by Mr. Gladstone in 1885. He was a member for some years of both the London School Board and the London County Council, and strongly supported the Progressive Party. Lord Hobhouse was all his life an advanced and uncompromising Radical. He supported Mr. Gladstone's Home Rule policy, and he vigorously opposed the South African War. He was a pleasant and genial man, very hospitable, and well known for the excellence of his table-talk.

Mr. Robert Ward, of Bangor Castle, County Down, who has just died at the age of eighty-five, was one of the best-known country gentlemen in Ulster. He was the only son of Michael Edward Ward, a prominent member of the Diplomatic Service, who was for many years Minister at Dresden, and he was a grandson of the first Viscount Bangor. Mr. Robert Ward's mother was Lady Matilda Stewart, daughter of the first Marquis of Londonderry, and half-sister to the second Marquis, the celebrated statesman who was best known as Lord Castlereagh. Mr. Robert Ward, who was educated at Eton and Christ Church, served for some years in the 10th Hussars. He is succeeded in his large estates by his only child, Lady Clanmorris.

The new Earl of Hardwicke, who is an uncle of the late peer, served in the Navy for twenty-eight years, and was engaged both in the Baltic and before Sebastopol during the Crimean War. He retired in 1882 with the rank of Captain.

Lord and Lady Amherst of Hackney have been staying at Didlington Hall, their seat in Norfolk, since the termination of their visit to Lord and Lady William Cecil at Hunmanby Hall, near Filey. It is possible that the Prince of Wales may spend two or three days at Didlington shortly after Christmas in order to shoot in Lord Amherst's preserves, which are among the best in East Anglia. Didlington is in a very ugly country, but the gardens are well laid out, and the extensive park, which is finely wooded, contains a picturesque lake, which swarms with wild fowl in winter. The house is handsome and well arranged, and is crammed with objects of art. Lord and Lady Amherst are going next month to the Riviera, for a long residence at their delightful villa at Valescure.

A number of articles which the late Lord Salisbury contributed to the Quarterly Review will be published in a volume by Mr. Murray in the course of a few weeks. These essays deal with literary and political subjects.

It is not surprising that Tories are envious of the advantage their opponents possess in the services of Mr. F. C. Gould. A Minister lately spoke of him as the real leader of the Liberal Party. Without carrying one's admiration to that length, one may truly say that Mr. Gould is a far greater force in the Party than several of the men usually counted among its leaders. It is only necessary to glance through the volume of "Political Caricatures, 1904," just published by Mr.

Edward Arnold, to recognise the value of the work "F. C. G." does for Liberalism. Never have his rare talents as a cartoonist been displayed to better purpose than during the past year. The fiscal controversy is, of course, the most fruitful of his themes, and Mr. Chamberlain is necessarily the dominant personality, but the Chinese labour question, with Mr. Lyttelton as the principal figure, also happily inspired Mr. Gould, and indeed almost every political topic of the day is dealt with in the collection.

Mr. Gould has also, by the way, illustrated the selection of verses, mostly political, by Sir Wilfrid Lawson which Mr. Fisher Unwin has published under the title of "Cartoons in Rhyme and Line." With an excess of self-depreciation, Sir Wilfrid styles himself "the worst of poets." For my own part, I much prefer the verses of the Lobby Laureate to those of the Poet Laureate. On all sorts of subjects Sir Wilfrid rhymes with wit and wisdom, and the outcome of his collaboration with Mr. Gould is a most entertaining book.

In congratulating the Daily Chronicle, the other day, on its Christmas Number, I referred to it as "a new departure." I ought to have limited the last expression to London journalism, for the Editor of the Western Morning News has written to point out that his journal has been publishing a Christmas Number regularly and successfully since 1891. Judging from the latest example, its success has been well deserved. Possibly I shall be told that other provincial journals have done the same thing, so to save trouble to them and me, I may as well say at once that I do not think it will be necessary to notice them all individually.

I see that London is promised two more new theatres—one of them an opera house of large dimensions. I wish that the founders when looking out for sites would get a few hundred yards away from the limited space into which the majority of West-End theatres are at present packed. The confusion and crowding in and around St. Martin's-lane, Coventry-street, and Leicester-square when the theatres are emptying are enough to deter nervous people from going to the theatre at all, and are inconvenient to everybody—not to say dangerous; indeed, it is a wonder that serious accidents do not constantly happen. The whole cab trade of London seems to be concentrated at night in these two or three narrow thoroughfares. Yet two or three times a year a new theatre is opened cheek by jowl with an old one, and a week or two hence, the new Coliseum will be ready to discharge an additional 3,000 people every night into the midst of the existing pandemonium. I understand the business reasons for keeping a particular trade in a particular quarter of the town, but in the case of the theatres there are very good reasons for extending the area a little as the trade increases. At the present rate we shall soon want "tubes", or overhead railways to take us to and from the theatres.

The following letter gives a view of the "Greek" question, for which there is a good deal to be said:—

Apropos of the recent outcry for the abolition of Greek, as a compulsory subject, from the Oxford curriculum, I have often wondered why Greek, rather than Latin, is always the language at which would-be reformers make such a dead set. If either of them is to be abolished, why not Latin? As a language, Greek is infinitely superior to Latin. And between the two literatures there is no comparison. Indeed, it is no exaggeration to say that Latin literature, as we have it, would never have existed at all but for the Greek models to which it owed its inception and inspiration. In other words, Latin literature is essentially a second-hand, imitative, and artificial literature, in which the lack of originality is very inadequately atoned for by mere neatness of form and studied polish of phrase.

Take the drama, for instance. What Latin tragedian can raise his head to dispute pride of place with Aeschylus, Sophocles, or even Euripides? Who would be so bold as to mention Plautus or Terence in the same breath with Aristophanes? Take epic poetry. What sane man would assign Virgil a seat by the side of Homer? Take philosophy. Who that had read his Plato or his Aristotle could tolerate, for a moment, the superficial platitudes of Seneca?

I remember writing an essay when I was a boy at school in which I referred to Cicero as the greatest orator in the world's history. My tutor contented himself with the pointed and sarcastic query: "Was there never such a man as Demosthenes?" The force of that query struck me more and more as I became better acquainted with that consummate master of Attic eloquence. I think that I have read most of the great speeches recorded in the literature of both ancient and modern times. But I have never read any speech at all comparable to the "De Corona." It would be interesting to know how many of our greatest speakers, both Parliamentary and forensic, have been indebted to the influence, conscious or unconscious, of the Attic orators. Lord Brougham admitted that he owed much of his success as a pleader to that source, and he stated categorically that all those passages in his speeches which both told most at the time and were most admired afterwards, had been assimilated, and in some cases translated, from Greek models. Certainly, also, the influence of Attic oratory is apparent in the speeches of Pitt and Fox, of Burke, Canning, and Gladstone. But who would listen with patience to a speaker that moulded his eloquence upon the artificial periods of Cicero?

I can understand a man objecting to the study of the dead languages in toto. I think his view is mistaken, indeed; but it is intelligible, and (so far as it goes) consistent. But what I cannot understand is, how any man—having the slightest acquaintance with the two languages—can advocate the retention of Latin, but cry out for the abolition of Greek. In the latter, we have a language as fine as, perhaps finer than, any language that has ever existed, and a literature, which, if it has been equalled, has certainly never been surpassed; in the former, a language and a literature that are, by comparison, second-rate. Yet the prevailing tendency nowadays is to do away with the better but to retain the worse. And what makes it more surprising is that this extraordinarily perverted policy should be seriously advocated in the sacred name of education.

Generally speaking, I agree with my correspondent. But when he asks who would listen to an orator who modelled himself on Cicero, I rather think a similar question might be asked in regard to Demosthenes. I do not say this out of any lack or respect for Demosthenes. It applies equally to all the alleged speeches handed down to us from times prior to the evolution of shorthand writing. Would any of them be effective if delivered to-day viva voce? I doubt it. The reason is that they are literary productions, not real speeches—just as are the speeches in Thucydides or Livy. They give us not what the speaker really said, but what some judicious editor attributes to him, or what he put into his own mouth when preparing his discourse for publication in the leisurely seclusion of his study. A good deal of the "Attic influence" which my correspondent detects in the speeches of Burke, Pitt, and their contemporaries may have been infused in this editorial process.

WHITEHALL COURT, S.W. FLATS FURNISHED OR UNFURNISHED. Overlooking Thames and Gardens. High Class catering with moderate tariff. Domestic service provided.

I doubt if it was so evident in the speeches as originally delivered, and if it had been I doubt if they would have been the more effective for it.

As regards Gladstone, I should say that his most effective speeches—those delivered from the platform—are those which show the least "Attic influence." The school of Parliamentary oratory, of which he was one of the last exponents, was modelled upon the written speeches of the older school, and, in my humble judgment, was often stilted and ineffectual for that reason. A born orator, like Gladstone or Bright, could shake off the trammels of an artificial, literary style; but in the mouths of ordinary mortals the political oratory of two or three generations back was apt to become the most prosy, soporific stuff imaginable.

Of course a great deal depends upon the audience. The late Mr. Spurgeon—one of the few real orators of the pulpit—would not have been a success as a Select Preacher at Oxford. The most telling platform style does not go down in the House of Commons, even in these democratic days. But, speaking generally, I think oratory, to be effective, requires to be racy and spontaneous and free from all smell of the lamp. If Demosthenes was as good a platform speaker as tradition declares, I should not be surprised, could one listen to him to-day, to find him a good deal more like Mr. John Burns than his published speeches would lead one to expect. On the whole, my advice to sucking orators, whether for the Church, the Bar, or "the Senate" is to get away from the classical models—Attic or otherwise. But, of course, I am a mere Philistine.

The announcement that Lord Alwyne Compton will resign the Bishopric of Ely in a few months has caused no surprise in the diocese, his early retirement having been expected for some time past. Lord Alwyne Compton, who is now in his eightieth year, had held the family living of Castle Ashby, near Northampton, for about a quarter of a century when Lord Beaconsfield appointed him to the deanery of Worcester in 1879 on the death of Dean Yorke. Nineteen years ago Lord Salisbury promoted him to the See of Ely, in succession to Bishop Woodford. Lord Alwyne Compton is a High Churchman, and he has always been a most popular prelate, while the course of the diocese has been most peaceful under his wise government. The picturesque old episcopal palace has been the scene of constant and most genial hospitality during Lord Alwyne Compton's episcopate, and his charming and accomplished wife has proved herself to be an ideal hostess for such a house. Lord Alwyne Compton holds the office of Lord High Almoner to the King, to which he was appointed by Queen Victoria in the autumn of 1882, after the death of Dean Wellesley.

The Bishop of Worcester has presented Archdeacon Walters to the pleasant living of Malvern Wells. Archdeacon Walters at present holds the Rectory of Alvechurch, near Redditch, which was formerly one of the richest benefices in the diocese, and it is in the gift of the Bishop. Archdeacon Walters was appointed to the Archdeaconry of Worcester by the late Bishop Philpott in 1889. He was for about twenty-five years Vicar of Pershore before his removal to Alvechurch on the presentation of the late Bishop Perowne.

Lord Brownlow has presented the Rev. Edward Clark, Vicar of Mattingley, Hants, to the Rectory of Little Gaddesden, Hertfordshire, vacant by the resignation of the Master of the Temple.

The Bishop of Worcester is to be absent from his diocese for five weeks from Monday next, and it is understood that the present diocese of Worcester will be divided and the new See of Birmingham fully constituted in the course of the next two months. It is now known that Bishop Gore intends to transfer himself to Birmingham, thereby losing £700 a year and undertaking much heavier work than will fall to the new Bishop of Worcester. There is a great desire among High Churchmen that the See of Worcester should be offered to Canon Newbolt, who was beneficed in that diocese when the late Lord Salisbury gave him the residentiary stall in St. Paul's Cathedral which had become vacant by the death of Dr. Liddon.

The consecration of Archdeacon Boutflower, the second Suffragan for the Diocese of Winchester, as Bishop of Dorking is to take place in Westminster Abbey on Wednesday, January 25. It is understood that the new Suffragan is to work principally in the northern division of the diocese, and it is expected that he will arrange to reside at or near Dorking.

Chancellor T. D. Bernard, who died last Wednesday at the age of eighty-nine, was for many years a most distinguished leader of the Evangelical party. He was conspicuously successful as Rector of the important parish of Walcot, Bath, where he accomplished a great work, and the admirably organised parish and the fine new church of St. Andrew's are enduring memorials of his ministry, which extended over twenty-three years. For thirty-three years he was a Canon Residentiary of Wells Cathedral, and there he literally recreated the choristers' school, which he rebuilt at his own cost, and he also founded an excellent high school for girls. Resigning his preferment when he felt age creeping over him, he spent the closing years of his life at High Hall, his place near Wimborne, and to the last he was always ready to give assistance in clerical work. Chancellor Bernard was three times Select Preacher at Oxford, and in 1864 he was Bampton Lecturer.

In regard to Evan Roberts, the Welsh revivalist, I have had a letter from Cardiff protesting that the movement has been caricatured in the Press accounts from which I derived my information, and that it deserves better treatment from TRUTH. I have no wish to do any injustice to the inspired collier, but my experience is that all these movements are evanescent. My Cardiff friend writes:—

> Some scores of empty churches are filled now. Thousands who never prayed before pray now. Drunkards are made sober and gamblers are made honest men. Ministers are made honest ministers.

All very desirable, no doubt. But how long will it last? I have a profound distrust of these spasmodic and hysterical conversions. I shall be told, I dare say, that a certain percentage of converts remains converted, and that this at least is so much to the good. But there are bad effects of these epidemics as well as good, and they are just as likely to be permanent.

I am glad to see in a recent issue of the Grimsby News a word of warning against an individual who has been collecting in that neighbourhood on behalf of the Gordon Memorial Day Nursery for Little Children—in other words, for the enterprising Africander who styles himself the Right Rev. Bishop McLaglen, D.D., LL.D. My readers know all about this worthy bishop and his bogus charitable enterprises; and it is to be regretted that his emissaries are still free to go about the country collecting money on his behalf—or on his behalf conjointly with their own, for they retain for themselves a very handsome share of the "swag." I hear that another of them—a man named Hicks, who has long been associated with McLaglen—has been operating during the last week or two at Epsom; and it would be well if the local Press would warn the residents of that neighbourhood against him also. As I have said before, McLaglen's business is one that ought long ago to have had the attention of the police.

The new building of the Royal Ear Hospital in Dean-street, Soho, which was opened on Monday by Lady Cheylesmore, is in every way excellently adapted to its purpose, and will add vastly to the usefulness of the institution. I take a special interest in ear hospitals, for no class of the sick poor are more exposed to the ravages of mischievous quacks than those afflicted with deafness and ear diseases, as the columns of TRUTH from time to time abundantly show. I would, therefore, take this opportunity of mentioning that the Royal Ear Hospital, though it has opened its new building, is still £6,500 short of the money required to pay for it. I hope that it will soon see this debt extinguished, and I do not know any better direction in which people can bestow the gifts they are making to hospitals during the Christmas season.

General Sir Baker Russell has been retired from the service under the age rule. He was engaged from 1857-59 during the Indian Mutiny, in the Ashanti War of 1873-4, in South Africa during the campaign of 1879, and during the Egyptian War of 1882, when he commanded the 1st Cavalry Brigade. He joined the Army in November, 1855, and was last employed as Commander of the Southern District, a post which he held from November, 1898, until November, 1903. He has been widely known as a popular and very able officer.

I hear that there has recently been another case of the blackballing of a batch of Army Medical officers at a Service club, the club this time being the Junior United Service. Since the abolition of all distinctive marks between the rank of medical and combatant officers, one has heard less than formerly of these displays of vulgar snobbishness, and it might have been hoped that a better state of feeling on such matters was growing up among Service men. One would think that, considering the difficulty there has been in keeping the Army Medical Service up to the mark, and the strenuous attempts that have been made to give medical officers the official footing in the Army to which their education and responsibilities entitle them, officers who hold, or have held, the King's Commission would have a sufficient amount of patriotic feeling and loyalty to the heads of the Army to avoid putting slights upon medical officers with a view of teaching them that they are an inferior order of beings, whatever the War Office or the Sovereign may order. But it is of course idle to argue with the pig-headed prejudices of the old-fashioned type of Service snob.

In spite of all the red tape attached to military administration there is a very considerable leakage of public money in connection with lodging allowances and similar military charges; and the Army Council would do useful work by ordering a searching inquiry into this matter, with a view to devising means by which the drawing of allowances which are not due would be checked. I am constantly hearing of abuses of this class, though from the nature of the case it is difficult to deal with them specifically. In one of the cases brought under my notice the offender is the quartermaster of a provincial military establishment who has been temporarily placed on the lodging list pending certain building operations. He draws, therefore, lodging, fuel, and light allowance, yet coal and wood from the depot stores are regularly conveyed to his temporary quarters, recruits being employed to take them through the town on a hand-cart, which is not in itself a very desirable arrangement. I suppose it is a little difficult to prevent any irregularity of this kind where the quartermaster himself is concerned, but it ought not to be impossible. At present it would seem that there is no attempt at any check in such cases.

So the Army Journal is dead—actually before it had taken its first airing in public. Poor, ill-starred little bantling! It was one of the "unwanted children," as Mr. Benjamin Waugh calls them, but though we can easily do without it, that does not make its sad fate less pathetic. I suppose there is not likely to be an inquest—at any rate, till Parliament meets; but if there were, it is one of those cases where the parents ought to be heavily censured, not only for the death but for the birth also. People just starting in life, like the Army Council, had no business to saddle themselves with a helpless encumbrance like this, trusting to the rate-payers to look after it.

The following incident has an interesting bearing on a subject that has lately been discussed at some length in these columns. A corporal serving with his regiment in India recently applied for a Post Office appointment in England, in anticipation of his discharge to the Reserve. He received and handed to his company officer the usual document as to character, etc., but in due course he was informed by his commanding officer that, in view of the terms of the Post Office form, the C.O. could not recommend him for the post, his character being unsatisfactory. The facts in regard to this corporal's character were as follows. He had completed six years and seven months without a single entry on his defaulter sheet. During the next twelve months he incurred four severe reprimands. The first was the result of his being secretary of the Army Temperance Association Branch, and some error having arisen in the accounts. It would appear that the corporal's own accounts were perfectly correct, but an error of Rs. 5 was found in the stock-book, which is kept by the barmen. The barmen were ordered to refund this money, and the corporal was severely reprimanded, apparently because he was officially responsible for the mistake. The second reprimand was the result of his being in bed after reveillé; the third was on account of some trifling breach of discipline in his room; and the fourth was for the awful crime of "walking out with a private soldier."

It will be seen, therefore, that this man's deficiencies in point of character had relation, not to any moral offence, but solely to trifling breaches of his duties as a non-commissioned officer. There is absolutely nothing against him which would lead any civil employer to hesitate to engage him; and though I do not know what the rules may be in the Post Office, that department is uncommonly lucky if the whole of its staff are of as irreproachable character as this corporal. Nevertheless, on the strength of these trumpery peccadillos, the man is denied further Government employment upon leaving the Army. And observe, it is not the Department from which he is seeking employment that refuses to take him, but it is the Army, which has done with him, that closes the door of the next Department against him. The case shows, what I have so frequently said, that instead of doing its best to help its men when they are returning to civil life, the Army deliberately tars their characters and throws obstacles in the way of their future career.

It is high time that this important matter of soldiers' characters was seriously discussed by the Secretary of State and the Army Council. The greatest obstacle to recruiting is the unfavourable outlook for the soldier when returning to civil life; and as long as it is the practice to discharge a man with an unsatisfactory character, not because he is drunken or dishonest, or for any other reason likely to be an untrustworthy servant, but merely for trifling infractions of military discipline, the country will continue to exhibit at every street corner warnings against enlistment in the shape of discharged soldiers looking in vain for work.

Another incident reported from India may be mentioned in this connection. At Lebong a few weeks ago two privates of the 1st Royal Fusiliers were awarded five days' C.B. for wearing their overcoats in town without permission. The men put on their overcoats, as anybody else would, because the day was very cold and damp. I would ask in the name of common sense why a soldier should not be as free to put on his overcoat when he feels the want of it as any civilian? Even if there were any reason for laying down that men shall not wear their overcoats when off duty without permission, obtaining permission ought to be a mere matter of form. If a man feels the want of an overcoat, and cannot obtain permission to wear it, the officer who withholds permission is the party who ought to be punished, rather than the man. One would think that these idiotic regulations were only devised for the purpose of making the Army unpopular. Yet it is the breach of such regulations that leads to a man being discharged from the Army with an unsatisfactory character, and being stranded in civil life in consequence.

Yet another point which has a bearing on the recruiting question. From a recent order in a regiment at Pretoria, it appears that a party is told off daily for eight hours (7 a.m. to noon and 1 p.m. to 4 p.m.) for R.E. works. The R.E. works for the time being are the digging of drains in the cantonments. For this work the men are paid 8d. a day, or 1d. an hour. I am all in favour of finding employment for soldiers when they are not engaged in their primary business of training for war. Such work, however, ought to be, as far as possible, skilled labour, which will be useful to them in after life, not the roughest kind of labourers' work; and when the work they are put to is useful to the country, it ought, on every ground, to be paid for at fair rates. To use soldiers' labour at sweaters' rates for the mere sake of saving money is bound to create discontent. Even a Chinaman in South Africa, under the famous Ordinance, gets more than 1d. an hour; and if the military authorities in South Africa have any difficulty in obtaining cheap labour, they have only to apply to Mr. Lyttelton and Lord Milner. It would be unjust to argue that these gentlemen will not do as much for the Army as they have done for the mine-owners.

Talking of South Africa, a growl reaches me from an officer with reference to the rebate of Customs' duty allowed by the Natal Government. Unfortunately the growler does not express himself as clearly as might be desired—which may or may not bear upon a recent report made by General Hutchinson. But I understand the point to be that, whereas all the Colonial Governments agreed to allow rebate at a certain rate from January 1 last, the Natal Government has refused to allow the same concession before February 1. One would suppose that this is due to some misunderstanding on the part of the Natal Government, but it is a very profitable misunderstanding for them, if it be true, as I am informed, that it means a loss to some of the senior officers concerned of as much as £5 a head, £1 17s. to subalterns, and 3s. 6d. to the rank and file.

I am credibly informed that since December 1 the proprietor of a public-house in Northgate-street, Chester, has been filling the appointment of chief pensioner clerk at the headquarters of the North-Western District at Chester. The gentleman in question is a late sergeant-major R.A.M.C. There is no doubt, therefore, as to his qualifications for the appointment he is filling; but it certainly seems to be a most extraordinary proceeding that a licensed victualler in the town should be selected for such a post. A very similar arrangement was recently brought to light at Gosport, but came to an end upon attention being called to it in Truth; and it is to be hoped that the same result will follow at Chester. To a mere civilian it would seem that the officer responsible for such an appointment must be somewhat to blame.

A few weeks ago I expressed astonishment on hearing that troops at Crown Hill, near Plymouth, were supplied with boots by a local maker. My astonishment seems to have been legitimate, for I was soon afterwards informed authoritatively that the statement which astonished me was absolutely without foundation. In justice to the Commanding Officer, this ought to be made known, and I should have done it before, only that I thought it due to the author of the statement to give him an opportunity of explaining himself. He has had the opportunity, and the desired explanation is not forthcoming, and the only conclusion I can come to is that his original communication was prompted by some form of mental aberration.

I do not pose as an authority on strategy—naval or military. Perhaps as a journalist I ought to; but it seems to me a mischievous kind of humbug, of which the public can get more than enough, if it wants it, from other quarters. Speaking, however, merely by the light of common-sense, I confess that the new scheme for the disposition of our Fleet in European waters seems to be rational and business-like. It has the air, at any rate, of being founded on an intelligent conception of possible requirements, and inspired by a disposition to move with the times. The Admiralty has its faults, like all Government Departments; and it has been allowed of late to make demands on the public purse beyond all reason. But there seems some ground for hope that it really gives us some sort of value for our money, which we have never got up to now from the sister Department.

What I do not understand in the new scheme is the necessity for the enormous naval force which we keep up in the Mediterranean. The only other naval Power in that sea worthy of consideration at the present time is France; and so far as human foresight can avail, we have removed all possible causes of quarrel with France beyond the region of practical politics. I may be wrong, but I can see no argument for keeping our present naval force in the Mediterranean against the possible designs of France, which would not equally require us to keep an overwhelming military force in Canada against the possible designs of the United States. The strategy of peace time ought to be moulded by foreign policy. What the foreign policy is which requires a Mediterranean squadron on the present establishment I am unable even to guess at. But the truth is that the strength of our whole Navy at the present moment bears no relation to any development in international politics which can reasonably be anticipated.

One sentence in Lord Selborne's Memorandum is peculiarly puzzling at the present time: "The Russian Navy has been greatly increased." Surely this last word must be a misprint for "diminished"! Never in recent years has there been such a thorough and rapid process of naval reduction as that which the Russian Fleet has lately experienced.

Another phrase which struck me is the announcement that all the old battleships have now been replaced by modern ones. This is a policy which ought to be applied to "personnel" as well as "matériel"—I do not mean so much at sea as on shore, and especially in the higher administrative circles, military as well as naval. If we could only get rid of all the old crocks in Government offices as easily as obsolete warships, we should be much nearer efficiency all round than we are now.

The situation at Port Arthur is now a very curious one. This fortress is essentially a naval one. It has been heroically held by the Russians, and not less heroically attacked by the Japanese, because it was the only asylum open to the Russian fleet after it had been driven from the high seas. The place has not yet been captured, but the Japanese have so far succeeded that their guns have command of the harbour, and have been able to destroy nearly every ship of war in it. For the same reason the place has become useless as a base or harbour of refuge for the relieving fleet now on its way out. Even if Rozhdestvensky wiped Togo off the sea, he dare not enter Port Arthur. There is, therefore, no conceivable reason why the Japanese should waste another life in attempting to capture the town itself, and equally little reason why the Russians should waste another life in attempting to hold it. Under these circumstances, one would think that nothing would be easier than to arrange an armistice for an indefinite period on the basis of the maintenance of the present situation. Yet in practice, I suppose, neither side will dream of such a thing. Why? Simply because it is a point of honour on both sides to go on pegging away and killing one another, though neither has anything to gain or lose, be the result what it may. Truly a noble pastime for rational beings!

Some very strong opinions reach me from India respecting the recent reorganisation of the Aitchison Chiefs' College at Lahore, which has resulted, among other things, in the removal of the late principal, Mr. Godley. Mr. Godley is a distinguished Oxford man, and was formerly, I believe, a master at Winchester. He has been for a number of years principal of the College, where he was by all accounts most successful, industrious and popular. He has been replaced by a junior assistant master from another English school, hardly of the first class, who receives double his predecessor's salary, and is allowed two assistants, at salaries largely in excess of the single assistant allowed to Mr. Godley. Roughly speaking, the cost of the staff under the reorganisation has been increased from about Rs.1,200 to above Rs.5,000 a month; and the opinion seems to be that the work will not be as well done as before, which seems probable, as the new staff are absolute strangers to it. Why Mr. Godley was dismissed is not evident; but one of my Indian correspondents attributes it to the fact that "with all his accomplishments and all his learning, Mr. Godley had never learnt the most necessary and useful accomplishment in an Indian career, namely, boot-blacking; in fact, he was one of the worst boot-blacks in all India." I do not know what truth there may be in this, but it is no uncommon thing for a man with this failing to be rewarded with the Order of the Boot.

There are some startling revelations as to the sanitary condition of Buckinghamshire in a pamphlet which Sir Edmund Verney has based upon the annual reports of the medical officers of health. He gives extracts from the reports showing that in many places the water supply is dangerously impure. The medical officer at Slough says that some 15,000 of the population are drinking from "polluted sources." In one delectable spot in this district the back gardens of a dozen cottages form "one marsh of overflowing sewage," and it is from wells "situated somewhere in the middle of the marsh" that the cottages obtain their water. From the Eton rural district ninety-eight samples of water were submitted for analysis, and sixty-one were found to be bad or doubtful. The medical officer at Long Crendon was asked to examine only two samples of water; both gave evidence of sewage pollution. Similar stories are told concerning the water supply in other parts of the county, and some of the reports on the subject of sewage disposal are equally alarming. As might be expected, cases of typhoid fever, diphtheria, and scarlet fever are of frequent occurrence, but in consonance with the general inefficiency of rural sanitary administration in Bucks, effective provision is scarcely ever made for dealing with these outbreaks. Year after year, also, the local authorities ignore the recommendations of the medical officers in regard to the inspection of dairies, cowsheds, and slaughterhouses.

The state of things depicted in these official reports is not by any means peculiar to Bucks. It exists in innumerable rural districts throughout the country, and it is probably almost as much responsible as the housing difficulty for the movement of the population to the towns. Even when Hodge can get a decent dwelling he is still too often exposed to risks from polluted water and defective drains which make life in the country as hazardous as in a city slum. There are continual lamentations over the rural exodus, but, as Sir Edward Verney remarks, in view of the conditions under which agricultural labourers and their families have to live, "the wonder rather is that any of them can be induced by any wages to remain in the country at all." He adds that it is, too, amazing that townspeople can be persuaded to consume at any price agricultural produce coming from such polluted districts. Happily for their peace of mind, however, townspeople are usually ignorant of the pestilential sources from which their supplies of milk and butter and poultry and meat are frequently drawn.

How hard it is for a rural community to secure protection from an admitted and remediable danger to health is shown by the fate of the village of Llanelly, Breconshire. For years past Llanelly has suffered from outbreaks of typhoid fever owing to the contamination of the water supply by leakages from a sewer belonging to the Brynmawr Urban Council, which passes along a hill above the village. Since I first drew attention to the matter in 1901, inquiries have been held by the Local Government Board and the Breconshire County Council, and various remedial measures have been recommended for adoption by the Brynmawr Council. This body, however, appears to hold that it has neither any legal nor any moral responsibility for the health and lives of the people of Llanelly, the village being situated in the district of the Crickhowell Rural Council, and practically nothing has been done to carry out the recommendations that were made. As a consequence Llanelly is now once more in the throes of a serious epidemic of typhoid fever, and the Crickhowell Council is once more invoking the assistance of the Local Government Board. The time really seems to have come when if any death in the village can be definitely traced to the negligence of the Brynmawr Council in connection with its sewer the members of that body ought to be indicted for manslaughter

In Bumbledom an appeal by a Guardian to the Local Government Board is evidently considered akin to high treason. One of the Leicester Guardians, after vainly calling the attention of his colleagues to a grievance in regard to the religious training of Roman Catholic children in the cottage homes, wrote to the authorities at Whitehall on the subject. In due course the letter was sent to the Guardians for their observations, whereupon they passed a resolution censuring the writer for communicating with the Local Government Board, but ignored the question whether his complaints were well founded or not.

Similar resentment has been shown by the Fylde Guardians against a lady member who reported to the Local Government Board that female inmates of the workhouse were employed in stone-breaking. They expressed their approval of this practice, and at the same time condemned the lady member's conduct in writing to the Board as "very unkind and unladylike." I hope that the Board will nevertheless insist upon the abolition of the stone-breaking task for female paupers in the Fylde Workhouse, and that it will also compel the Leicester Guardians to answer the charge that has been made concerning the Catholic pauper children. In both cases the position assumed by the majority of the Guardians is simply ridiculous. Not only has every individual Guardian a perfect right to inform the Local Government Board of anything that he deems wrong in the administration of the Union, but in many instances the Guardians as a body are so negligent or so callous that this is the only means by which abuses can be corrected.

The exhaustive report of Dr. Branthwaite, the Inspector under the Inebriates Acts, shows that, although steady progress has been made in the administration of the Acts, a good deal remains to be done. Many local authorities are still loth to take advantage of their powers to provide establishments for the treatment of drunkenness, or even to make arrangements to pay for cases as they arise. On the other hand, the Great Unpaid still, as a body, show themselves content to provide penal instead of reformatory treatment for old offenders, and in spite of the preponderance of the courts served by the unpaid magistracy the courts over which stipendiaries preside have furnished the larger proportion of cases. Bumble and Shallow individually are difficult enough to move, but it is infinitely harder to get them to move forward jointly on the path of progress.

I have been looking out for some explanation from Mr. A. F. Harratt, solicitor, of Ely-place, Holborn, of certain evidence given the other day in a prosecution at Marlborough-street, but up to the present I have not noticed it. The prosecution was instituted by the Holborn Borough Council against the occupants of certain flats in Bloomsbury, and the porters attached to the building. The places were shown to have been conducted in a most disreputable manner, the rents charged were extortionate, and one of the women pleaded that she could not pay her rent in any other way than that which the Borough Council objected to—a view which the observations of the magistrate seemed rather to endorse. The head porter, who was convicted not only of assisting in the offence of the tenants, but of resisting the police when arrested, was the landlord's representative, and collected the rents. After the prisoners had all been heavily fined, the Holborn Town Clerk went into the box, and stated that the landlord was Mr. A. F. Harratt, above mentioned. Mr. Harratt, I should think, ought to have something to say in reply. If he has already said it, and I have missed his reply, I shall be happy to co-operate with him in giving it wider publicity.

THE LANCET IN A NEW RÔLE.

[The Lancet has varied its condemnation of everything man eats or drinks by going in hot and strong this week in favour of the hot potato as purveyed in the streets of London.]

Ah! Who shall, after this, deny
That Christmas can a genial ban set
E'en on the croakings that appear,
Week after week, within the Lancet?
For here 's the paper that hereto
Has been as cynical as Cato,
Proclaiming now the high esteem
In which it holds the street-potato!

And not the one we eat at home,
Or at the club—mashed up with butter,
No! but the "spud" baked in the can
That still steams gaily in the gutter!
Yes! this is what the Lancet lauds,
And coolly tells the upper classes
Is a delightful plat too long
Consumed entirely by the masses!

Think how, a month or so ago,
The Lancet, treating this same question,
Would in a learnéd way have sniffed
At what is now its own suggestion!
How 'twould have pleased it to describe
The way the can reeked with bacteria,
And how its patrons ailments risked
In "itis" ending, or in "eria"!

Now, of such dangers there 's no hint,
But London's middle class and upper
Are urged to seek the "ball o' flour,"
And eat a fine al-fresco supper!
Surely the Spirit of the Times
Must be just now in rarest fettle,
When even the potato-can
Can't put the Lancet on its mettle!

Or is it an ironic joke
In which the doctors are engaging?
A variation in the war
Which 'gainst the microbe they are waging?
Well, time will show; but 'twill be best—
Recalling what was urged by Plato—
To wait and next week's Lancet see
Before we try a street-potato!

There will be a vacancy in the Court of Session at the end of this month, caused by the resignation of Lord Trayner, who was raised to the Bench in 1885. He is a very able judge, and his retirement is much regretted. It is understood in the Edinburgh Parliament House that the Solicitor-General for Scotland (Mr. David Dundas, K.C.) will be the new Judge.

The Court of Appeal gave an important judgment last week in a case under the Moneylenders Act which was originally tried by Mr. Justice Kekewich in June last, and noticed in Truth at the time. The plaintiffs were Philip and Braham Samuel, two usurers trading under the registered alias of "P. Saunders," and the defendant was the executor of the late Mr. H. T. Alton, a brewer, of Derby. In October, 1903, Mr. Alton borrowed £2,000 from the plaintiffs upon a promissory note for £3,300, payable in twelve monthly instalments of £275 each. The interest was, therefore, at the rate of upwards of 100 per cent. per annum. As the plaintiffs were well aware, Mr. Alton was a man of substance—his estate was sworn at the net value of £42,000—and he would have had no difficulty in borrowing money from a banker at the ordinary current rate, but, owing to his intemperate habits he had become negligent and incompetent in matters of business. He died a few days after the payment of the first instalment, and his executor thereupon offered to pay off the balance of the loan with interest at 10 per cent. The plaintiffs refused to accept this, and, default having occurred upon the next instalment, sued the executor for the immediate payment of the whole amount outstanding, which meant that they then claimed interest at the rate of 418 per cent. per annum.

Holding that the transaction was "harsh and unconscionable" within the meaning of the Moneylenders Act, Mr. Justice Kekewich gave judgment for the executor and ordered that an account should be taken on the footing that the plaintiffs should receive back the amount that they had advanced with interest thereon at the rate of 10 per cent. per annum. His lordship also ordered the inclusion in the account of a previous transaction between the parties, Alton having borrowed £1,000 from "P. Saunders" in July, 1903, and paid back £1,400 in the following September. It was against this decision that the plaintiffs appealed. So far as the October loan of £2,000 was concerned, the Court of Appeal sustained the decision of Mr. Justice Kekewich, agreeing with him that the transaction was harsh and unconscionable, and expressing the opinion that the 10 per cent. which he had allowed was "amply sufficient." In reference to the July loan, however, the Court held that the reopening of this transaction had been technically wrong, and they therefore excluded it from the account, though without prejudice to the right of the executor to bring a further action to re-open it. The plaintiffs were left to pay the whole of the costs in the action before Mr. Justice Kekewich and also their own costs in the appeal, so that altogether their success on one technical point will be somewhat unprofitable.

The case threw an instructive light upon the relationship between several bloodsuckers whom I have repeatedly pilloried. It appeared that Mr. Alton had had the misfortune to fall into the hands of a notorious tout named Henry Sagar, who bags victims for a whole gang of unscrupulous extortioners, including Isaac Abrahams (otherwise "The Bedfordshire Loan Co."), Charles Samuel (alias "B. S. Thomas"), and the above-mentioned Braham and Philip Samuel. In this muddle-headed inebriate they discovered a rich and easy prey, and a nice little party had been formed by Sagar to divide the spoil. Sagar himself took fat commissions out of the loans that were arranged, and though "P. Saunders" was nominally the lender of the £2,000, several other usurers joined in as what Lord Justice Vaughan-Williams characterised as "co-adventurers" in the transaction. It is a matter of great satisfaction to know that on this occasion the law has effectually checked their rapacity.

The Moneylenders Act was also enforced with good effect last week in a case tried by the Lord Chief Justice of Ireland in Dublin. The plaintiff was a usurer named Charles Wells, of Leicester, who has long carried on his pernicious business among small tradesmen and farmers over here, and is now apparently extending his sphere of operations to Ireland. By means of one of his newspaper advertisements, a Galway farmer was lured into his toils, signing a promissory note for a loan repayable in monthly instalments with interest which worked out at the rate of about 90 or 100 per cent. per annum. There were two subsequent transactions, and the net result was that at the end of twelve months the borrower had received altogether £140, and paid back £155, but still owed Wells £69, for which sum that shark sued him under the usual default clause, making the whole outstanding amount due forthwith whenever any one instalment was not paid. The Lord Chief Justice came to the conclusion that the transaction was harsh and unconscionable, and accordingly he gave the usurer judgment only for the reduced amount of £40, payable in two instalments in January and March next. A still more substantial reduction might perhaps have justly been made, but it is at any rate satisfactory to know that Shylock did not get his full pound of flesh, and that he will, moreover, have to pay his own costs out of what he did get.

My Legal Pillory this week is adorned by an instructive contrast between two sentences upon an animal-torturer and a poacher respectively at Warminster. The former had been guilty of the gross cruelty of deliberately starving animals, but he was nevertheless let off with a fine four times less in amount than that which was imposed upon the defendant charged with trespassing in search of game. In the eyes of the rural magistracy the preservation of game is, of course, a very much more important matter than the prevention of cruelty. There are several examples of the misguided leniency with which dastardly assaults upon women are treated. At Queen's Park, Glasgow, a man was charged with severely injuring his wife by throwing a kettle of boiling water at her. It was his fifteenth conviction for assault, but with the fatuous remark that "nothing appeared to be a lesson to him," Bailie O'Hare allowed the ruffian to escape with a pecuniary penalty instead of inflicting the term of imprisonment with hard labour which he so richly deserved. The Bournemouth Bench is also represented by a preposterously inadequate sentence upon a brute who had beaten his wife about the head and face with a bottle, causing serious wounds. On the other hand, a couple of men convicted of damaging a door and breaking a pane of glass at Somerton were committed to gaol for a month, and the list also contains other sentences of imprisonment for poaching, petty larceny, and sleeping out:—

Warminster Petty Sessions. Before Captain A. H. Southey, Colonel W. P. Alexander, and Messrs. G. N. Temple, W. F. Morgan, and A. Newall. Mark Whatley Hobbs, carrier, charged with cruelty by starving two pigs. The animals were in a filthy and neglected state, and "nothing but skin and bone," defendant giving them only just enough food to keep them alive. He had plenty of food about the premises. The magistrates said the pigs had been cruelly starved. Fined 10s. and costs.

Needham Market Petty Sessions. Before Mr. R. H. Tidswell, and other magistrates. Herbert Simpson, charged with assaulting Wm. Leathers. Defendant attacked the complainant in the road at night, striking him with a stick and also kicking him. Fined £1 2s., including costs.

Bournemouth Borough Police-court. Before the Mayor, Major Maunsell, and Alderman Parsons. Frederick William Wareham charged with an aggravated assault upon his wife. He held her down and struck her with a glass bottle on the back of the head, the temple, and the nose, inflicting wounds which bled profusely and causing her to become unconscious. She was kept in bed for ten days, and the doctor said that one of the wounds on the back of her head was very deep and might have been very dangerous. Fined £2 and £1 10s. costs, and bound over to keep the peace.

Warminster Petty Sessions. Before the same magistrates. Edward Foyle, charged with trespassing in search of game. It was stated that defendant had a young dog which coursed a hare but did not catch it. Fined £2 and costs.

Louth Borough Police-court. Before the Mayor, Messrs. A. Ingoldby, F. M. Thompson, and J. Cusworth, Alderman Hall, and Dr. Best. James North, charged with sleeping-out and having no visible means of subsistence. One month.

Clitheroe County Petty Sessions. Before Messrs. C. J. B. Trappes, R. Trappes-Lomax, J. T. Whipp, and R. Hindle. John Thomas Hall and John Turner, charged with trespassing in pursuit of game. Fined £2 each and costs.

Somerton Police-court. Before Messrs. E. W. Valentine and A. Dickinson. Tom Williams and John Clarke, charged with damaging a door to the extent of 4s., and with breaking a pane of glass value 1s. at a public-house. The damage was done during a struggle between the defendants and other men. One month each.

Blandford Police-court. Before the Mayor and Mr. G. W. Daniell. Geo. Hurley, charged with poaching. One month.

Barnstaple Police-court. Thos. Popham, charged with sleeping-out and having no visible means of subsistence. Seven days.

Kirkcaldy Police-court. Before Bailie Westwater. James Kelly, charged with assaulting his wife; also with assaulting his three step-children. There were eleven previous convictions against him for assault. Fined 20s.

Coatbridge Police-court. Patrick Williams, a football player, charged with assaulting two members of the committee of a football club. Because the committee excluded him from the club team the accused made a violent attack upon the complainants, both being knocked down and otherwise assaulted. Fined 20s.

Haywards Heath Petty Sessions. Before Major Berrer and other magistrates. William Kinch, charged with assaulting his wife. He knocked her head against a wall, blackened her eye, and bruised her face and arms. Fined £2 and costs.

Newport Borough Police-court. William Fitzgerald, charged with assaulting Robert Shakeshaft and William Poulson. Without the slightest provocation he brutally assaulted both the complainants. Fined 40s. in each case.

Forfar Sheriff Court. Before Sheriff Lee. William Mackenzie and Thomas Donald, charged with trespassing in pursuit of game. Mackenzie fined £1 10s.; Donald £3 5s.; in default, thirty days.

Oakham Petty Sessions. Before Messrs. R. Heathcote, G. H. Finch, G. J. Noel, and W. H. Neill. Charles Louth, charged with stealing a loaf of bread. Fourteen days.

Kettering Police-court. Jos. White and Frederick Holliwell, charged under the Poaching Prevention Act with being found in possession of eight rabbits. Fined £2 3s. 4d. each; in default, one month.

Woodbridge Petty Sessions. Before Mr. J. Loder and other magistrates. Horace Walter Chambers, charged with poaching. Six weeks.

Chippenham County Police-court. Before the Mayor. Henry Kite, charged with sleeping-out. Seven days.

Thornbury Police-court. Before Admiral H. C. St. John and Mr. Wm. Cullimore. George Lawrence, charged with stealing a pair of boots from outside a shop. One month.

Queen's Park Police-court, Glasgow. Before Bailie O'Hare. Jas. Blackley, charged with assaulting his wife by throwing a kettle of boiling water at her. The woman was severely scalded about the legs and feet. There were fourteen previous convictions against the accused for assaults, and the magistrate remarked that nothing appeared to be a lesson to him. Fined 42s., and bound over.

The relation between the County Court system and improvidence among the working classes is further exemplified by the interesting letter which the Registrar of Leeds County Court has addressed to the Times. From a single morning's work in his court the Registrar cites nine cases in which debtors earning from 18s. to 28s. per week have mortgaged from 2s. 6d. to 4s. of that amount for furniture acquired on the hire-purchase system. It is worth note that one of the men who is paying the top amount (4s.) is the one at the bottom of the list in point of wages (18s.). In four of the cases the full price of the furniture exceeds the total amount of the unsecured debts; so that, as the Registrar points out, the debtor has practically furnished his house with money that ought to have gone to the grocer or the draper or the other creditors on whom he has been living.

The point which this evidence brings out is that men who have not even a stick of furniture that they can call their own, and whose wages are heavily charged in favour of the furniture dealers, are still able to get credit from other tradesmen; and there can be no doubt that Mr. Cantherley, the Leeds Registrar, gives the true explanation of this state of things: "In a very large number of cases the County Court forms the only basis upon which credit is given." In other words, the security on which the tradesman gives credit is the power of squeezing a man who is in regular employment by means of the judgment summons and the suspended commitment order. But for the ultimate remedy against the creditor's body no credit would be given. The whole of this mischief would be swept away if imprisonment for debt were really abolished.

Apropos of the miscarriages of justice that have lately been brought to light, a correspondent relates an incident that occurred in a court of quarter sessions where he was foreman of the grand jury. He chanced to discover that a prisoner against whom the grand jury found "no bill" was nevertheless tried (and acquitted) by a petty jury. It was ascertained that the indictment had been plainly endorsed "no bill," and the clerk of the court frankly confessed that it was through a gross blunder on his part that the prisoner was put on his trial. Of course, no particular harm was done; indeed, I think myself that these preliminary private investigations by a grand jury, which are usually conducted in a most perfunctory manner, might be abolished with advantage to the administration of justice. But the incident is of interest as showing how easily mistakes may happen in any court.

For a man to be found injured and insensible in the street seems to be regarded at Tottenham as a proof that he is drunk and incapable. This was recently the experience of George Coote, a respectable working man, the caretaker at a local chapel and a total abstainer for twenty years. At the hearing of the case before the Tottenham J.P.s, it appeared that one afternoon during a dense fog Coote was discovered lying in an unconscious condition in a pool of blood at the edge of the pavement. He was conveyed to the police-station and charged with drunkenness. Two constables swore that he was drunk, and the police-surgeon who dressed the wounds on his nose and lips also expressed the opinion that he was "suffering from intoxication." It was furthermore alleged that Coote behaved violently, but it was admitted that this was only when a dressing was applied to a severe cut on his lip which would make it smart. For the defence, Coote stated that when he was about to cross the road in the fog he was knocked down by a motor-bicycle, and his overcoat bore a mark such as would have been made by a bicycle-wheel running into him. A coffee-stall keeper who had served him with a cup of coffee an hour before his arrest deposed that he was then quite sober; and a doctor who examined him on his release from custody said that at that time (eight hours after his arrest) Coote showed no trace whatever of drunkenness, but all the symptoms of concussion of the brain.

From inquiries into this case, I have not the least doubt that what the police witnesses looked upon as signs of drunkenness were really the effects of the accident with which the defendant met. It is by no means an uncommon thing for illness to be mistaken for drunkenness; indeed, a case of the kind occurred last week at Lambeth, where the stipendiary magistrate discharged the accused. Coote's case—to put it at the very lowest—presented an element of doubt of which any competent judge would have given him the benefit. Unfortunately, however, he came before a set of pudding-headed amateur magistrates who conceive it to be their duty to treat police evidence as impeccable and infallible, and so he was convicted and fined 5s. and costs. The blunder by the police was bad enough, but this miscarriage of justice by the Tottenham Shallows was many degrees worse.

I have often remonstrated with certain of my contemporaries in this country for accepting the advertisements of McLaughlin, of Electro Vigour fame, but I must do them the justice to admit that I do not think they would ever have printed the disgusting advertisements now appearing in the South African Press, puffing a rival electric belt, called the Herculex. This is the property of a concern calling itself the Dr. Sanden Electric Company. The South African representative of the company is apparently a Dutchman named Marthinus Jacobus Piepers, and he has already come into conflict with the law, and been fined for practising as a medical man without a licence. The methods of puffing Herculex and Electro Vigour are so nearly identical that I should not be surprised to find that "Dr." Sanden and "Dr." McLaughlin are one and the same person.

In one of the follow-up letters in which K. Leo Minges, otherwise the Cartilage Company, of Rochester, New York, pursues those who have once applied to him for information as to his secret of how to grow tall, he reduces the price from three guineas to two guineas cash with order, and one guinea to be paid when the extra growth has been effected. This is very self-sacrificing on the part of Minges, for I have a suspicion that if his short customers were to attempt to do what he declares they can do, there would be very few of the final guineas forthcoming. Minges says that when his apparatus is adjusted comfortably to the patient's head, any person can increase his height instantly from two to three inches. Mr. Billington, I believe, is accustomed to use a very simple apparatus to produce the same results, but after the operation the persons who have been lengthened are rarely in a position to pay their debts.

In his lively and vigorous speech at the Gimcrack Club dinner, Lord Durham stigmatised the advertising and circularising tipsters as scoundrels who exercised a most pernicious influence on the Turf. He commended the example Truth has set for years past by exposing and denouncing "the most notorious of these wretches," and he appealed to the leading sporting newspapers to discontinue the publication of their advertisements. It is certainly difficult to understand how journals which profess to be concerned for the reputation of the Turf can be content to aid and abet such harpies. As Lord Durham pointed out, their advertisements and circulars usually show either that they are procuring information from training stables by improper and dishonest means, or else that they are selling tips by false pretences. Personally, I have not the least doubt that the latter is the true explanation in nine cases out of ten.

The touting tipster's talk about stable secrets, and so on is generally all humbug. More often than not he is in no better position to predict the result of a race than the man in the street. His prediction is a pure guess, and his dupes might just as well guess for themselves as pay him to do so. One of the tricks of the trade is for the tipster to recommend in turn to different backers every horse engaged in a race, so that, whatever wins, a certain proportion of the tips sent out are bound to come off. This a favourite dodge of the gentry whose prophecies are offered on the condition that the client shall pay them so much for each winner; and it is also worked by such swindlers as the notorious Beston, of the Midland Referee, who carries on his nefarious business under upwards of a dozen aliases. No doubt the people victimised are mostly fools; but that fact does not make the conduct of the knaves engaged in this game any the less mischievous and reprehensible. The touting tipster is a curse, not only to the Turf, but to the community at large, and, as Lord Durham urges, he ought to be suppressed.

The latest circular from one of these pests that I have come across is signed "H. S. Marshall," and dated from Briar Lodge, Teddington. "I am not a regular tipster," Marshall writes; "I scorn all such people. I am a bonâ-fide Worker of Commissions for Stables. In the course of my business good things sometimes reach me. . . ." Needless to say, this is the preface to an offer to send you these good things, the payment required being "the odds to 2s. 6d. each winner." In this particular circular Marshall sent, unsolicited, a tip for a race last week; but unfortunately for his reputation as a purveyor of good things, the horse he recommended was not even placed.

I would warn all my readers in Brighton and the South of England generally against advertisements now appearing in the local papers in the name of the Brighton and South Coast Tradesmen's Mercantile Society, of Ship-street Chambers, Brighton. These advertisements are of a similar character to those of the defunct Armadale Company, and the Mercantile Syndicate, Limited, of London, of which a full account has already been given in these columns. The tradesmen are asked whether they want to extend their business, whether they want a partner, or additional capital, or to form their businesses into joint-stock companies; and if they do, the Brighton and South Coast Tradesmen's Mercantile Society declares that it can introduce "over 1,500 investors who have sums from £250 to £20,000 awaiting sound investments." Side by side with these tempting announcements appear notices of "Directors wanted" with qualifications ranging from £500 to £1,000, and "Secretaries wanted" with qualifications ranging from £250 to £500.

If any directors and secretaries are forthcoming on these terms, the B.S.C.T.M. Society will have that number of "investors awaiting investments," sound or otherwise; but I am quite sure it will not have them from any other source. In point of fact, this pretended society is one W. Smith. He has in past times been connected in some way with the gang who are now figuring in London as the Tradesmen's Legal Aid Society and the Mercantile Syndicate, Limited, and he himself has started two abortive enterprises on more or less similar lines, one called the Business Men's Legal Aid Society, and the other the Tradesmen's Legal Aid Society, or some such names. Smith appeared at Brighton some months ago, and obtained possession of the office he now occupies in Ship-street by stating that he represented the Mercantile Syndicate, Limited, which was about to open a branch at Brighton; and he gave references to two firms who, strange to relate, were prepared to answer for the trustworthiness of the aforesaid syndicate. In other words, he obtained a footing in Brighton by a swindling trick. He appears to have made use of the name of the Mercantile Syndicate in other ways; and last week there appeared in the Brighton papers a public apology signed by him, in which he declared that he had no connection with the Mercantile Syndicate, Limited, and apologised to that concern for having misled people in the manner above mentioned. It will be readily judged that there is far more likelihood of Mr. Smith obtaining money out of parties who go to him in search of that commodity than of their obtaining capital out of him, and if he has had any success in that direction up to now, those who have parted with their money would do well to take legal advice without delay.

A good deal of discussion has been excited in trade circles by some obiter dicta on the subject of "tipping" employees which fell from Mr. Justice Grantham in the recent case of Bradley v. Harrod's Stores. His Lordship rather pooh-poohed the idea that there is anything wrong in a customer tipping a servant of a firm with whom he is doing business. There was nothing criminal in it, he said, adding that "a little palm oil has often been found to make the wheels of business run smoothly." There is no doubt about that; but if his Lordship had bethought himself a little before speaking, he would doubtless have remembered that the smoothness resulting from the application of palm oil is frequently very bad business for the party whose servants' palms are greased, and also that the system has frequently developed into something little short of blackmail. Although there may be nothing criminal in trade tipping as generally practised, another learned Judge, Sir Edward Fry, has laboured strenuously to make it so, and I think there is an overwhelming preponderance of public opinion in favour of the measure he has proposed.

I have been in communication on this subject with Messrs. John Knight and Sons, Limited, of Silvertown, who also wrote to the Times last week with reference to Mr. Justice Grantham's remarks. They give an edifying picture of the extent to which this evil prevails in the soap trade, and describe some of the attempts that have been made to meet it. What is true of this trade is notoriously true of many others—the printing trade, for instance, as to which there was an interesting discussion in the Master Printer and Newspaper Owner, two or three months ago. A certain section of the soap-boilers of London have agreed among themselves to drop the use of palm oil for the purpose of lubricating the wheels of business. But the remainder stand out, apparently because they do not feel able to trust one another, and fear that if an agreement were come to some firm would violate it to the prejudice of its competitors. It is just for this reason that trade combination cannot be trusted to suppress the evil effectually; and it therefore becomes necessary to call in the assistance of the law. At present the call is in vain, simply because Parliament cannot find time to get through its own business. But a little more pressure from public opinion would soon get over that difficulty.

Apropos of the "Just as Good" controversy, which has been proceeding merrily in the Daily Mail, the Pharmaceutical Journal has some pertinent observations in its current issue. Roughly summarised, these amount to a claim on behalf of the chemist to be in a position to discover the exact proportions of all the ingredients in practically every advertised remedy, to prepare a precisely similar compound freshly made under his own supervision, and supply it at a price commensurate with its real value. Under these circumstances the Journal asks how the purchasing public can be defrauded by receiving a precisely similar medicine at one-half the price which would have to be paid for the advertised nostrum. Obviously the public would suffer more if it paid for the advertising as well as the medicine, and the only method by which the big advertiser can deal with this form of competition is not by inspired articles in friendly newspapers, but by allowing the chemist such a percentage of profit on their preparations as will make it not worth his while to push his own preparations.

My recent allusion to the secrets of Freemasonry has provoked much scoffing from the spokesmen of the craft, and I am surprised and grieved to find that the Masonic organs in particular seem to be seriously aggrieved at my remarks. One Mason is reported as having told a press representative that my description of the rites could not be correct because the King is a Freemason. I do not quite see the sequitur. I have not said anything reflecting on the craft; quite the contrary. Neither had I any idea that I was making a surprising disclosure, for the whole thing has been given away a hundred times before. Any one, indeed, must be very foolish who supposes that hundreds of thousands of people can be initiated as Masons without the secrets of the craft ever leaking out. What surprises me, in fact, is that anybody should have been surprised at the few harmless facts which I mentioned. At any rate, nothing was further from my intention than to wound the susceptibilities of any Mason. I have too many good friends among the craft for that; and as I thought I indicated, I admire the brethren for their generous and unfailing charities. In England Freemasonry does a great deal of good, and hurts nobody. In France and some other Continental countries it is somewhat different, and this was what I endeavoured to point out.

By the way, I hope that what I have just said will be a sufficient answer to the innumerable offers I have received of further information about Masonic secrets. I am not a Freemason—I sometimes wish I was—but I know quite as much about the craft as I want to. In spite of indignant denials, I am quite satisfied that what I know is correct—though possibly the numerous correspondents who tell me that "Boas" should be spelt with a "z," are in the right. I suppose the people who offer information—on more or less easy terms—are all renegade Masons. If so, it would seem that the Masonic flock—like others—is not exclusively composed of white sheep. This is, of course, the reason why, as I said, the secrets of Freemasonry are no secrets at all in these days.

The best observations I have seen on this question are those of the Provincial Grand Master (whom I am pleased to know as R.W. Bro. Colonel Lockwood, M.P.) to a convivial gathering at Colchester:—

> The world was welcome to know the secrets of Freemasonry. If the world would follow the example of unity and charity set by Masons there was no more necessity for Freemasonry. Their secrets, their regalia, their rank, were nothing compared with the objects they had in view. (Applause.)

I humbly join in the applause.

A CHILDISH SUGGESTION.

> The great fault of ours nowadays is that we grown people are not childish enough.—Mr. Arthur Morrison, in The World and his Wife.

Mr. Morrison, says, and no doubt Mr. M.
Is a critic who speaks with authority,
That a failing which he is resolved to condemn
Is afflicting the social majority.
Grown people, he vows—though of course he allows
That some—the exceptions—are "wildish"—
Must be deemed, as a rule, if we take them all round,
To be far from sufficiently childish.

Now, although with possessing this singular fault
He is ready enough to attaint us,
Yet in what kind of way we his hints should obey
And be childish, he doesn't acquaint us.
P'rhaps he means we should try "blind man's buff" with a zest,
And e'en be sufficiently "chipper"
For an hour every day at "Dumb Crambo" to play,
Or to Hunt, twice a week, say, the Slipper!

Or perhaps we should childishness try to attain
By a lavish consumption of ices;
By absorbing mince-pies, of inordinate size,
And consuming of Pudding huge slices!
Or are we in place of remaining as wise
As our friends and our neighbours have thought us,
To be like a child in the way that the mild
And the bland Mr. Balfour has taught us?

One thing is quite certain—we 've "statesmen," so called,
So unstable, so rash, so unsteady,
That we look upon them—pace Mr. A.M.—
As a little too childish already!
Thus, however we spread what this critic has said,
'Twill at once, we believe, be conceded
That wherever more childishness may be required,
It will not be in Downing-street needed!

But Yule-tide is near, and if childishness now
Is assumed to be sanctioned by reason,
There 's an excellent chance the new cult to advance
In the course of this mirth-making season.
And what with the holly and mistletoe bough,
What with dining, and dancing, and mumming,
We can all of us try, with mere children to vie,
In the days of Misrule that are coming!

I am told that the figures I gave last week as to the number of hands employed in the industries immediately dependent on the sugar trade very much understated the truth. There cannot be much doubt about that, for the President of the National Union of Mineral Water Manufacturers stated in a recent letter to the Times that in normal times the mineral water trade alone employs nearly 200,000 workers. This is five times the figure I gave for the whole of this group of trades, but no doubt my figure refers to jam, biscuits, confectionery, and suchlike industries, exclusive of the mineral water trade. I have seen or heard various estimates of the number of hands employed in these trades, ranging from 42,000 up to 100,000. I put it at the lowest amount in order to be within the mark, for, even at the lowest calculation, these industries are six times as valuable to the country as the sugar-refining industry was in its palmiest days.

Moreover, I understand that it is difficult to get at the numbers employed in those trades exactly, and the reason is worth mention. The only available source of information is the Census returns, and in the Census the employees in question are returned under a variety of headings, which give no clue to the nature of the industry in which they are at work; for instance, many of the hands may class themselves as "engineers," "stokers," "packers," "warehousemen," or what not. This observation applies, of course, to a very large number of industries; and the point ought to be taken into consideration when arrangements are being made for the next Census.

The Italian Chamber consists of 500 members. Of these 100 are the personal followers of the Prime Minister, Signor Giolitti; 100 are Conservatives, 100 are Socialists, Republicans, Anarchists, and ultra-Radicals, and 200 are waiters on Providence, but by way of being Liberals. The Conservatives are aware that they cannot hope to be able under present circumstances to form a Government, and a good many of them will support Giolitti provided that he does not prove himself too Radical, and even then they will hesitate to turn him out lest they may exchange the frying-pan for the fire. They will, however, angle for the waiters on Providence, and if they can gain over a sufficient number of them to their side they will not be above accepting the aid of the extremists. Of the extremists, probably, were Giolitti to make any issue a question of confidence, and find himself likely to be defeated, about fifty would either vote with him or abstain. Giolitti has consequently a sufficient number of winning cards in his hands to be able to defy Parliamentary opposition if he knows how to play them, and I think that he does.

The General Election has shown that the majority of the electors have become afraid of the tactics of the extremists. Their attempt to force their views on the country by means of a general strike has been resented. Giolitti very cleverly seized this moment to dissolve, declared that all who were for existing institutions should rally to him, and thus succeeded in securing a majority more or less elected to support him. The Conservatives are already complaining that, having thus secured it with their help, he is now determined to rule on Radical lines. His reply is practically this: "I have always been of opinion that the extremists are best fought by giving full effect to Radical reforms, and that in this way alone can the monarchy be maintained. I have never concealed that I am a Radical, and I intend to remain one."

That he is a Radical is probable, but he is also an Opportunist. Were he to seek to hold his post by any weakening in his Radicalism, he would be defeated, and if so, and he were to dissolve, he would fall between two stools. On the other hand, were he defeated by a Conservative vote for being too Radical, an appeal to the country would probably result in his favour; whilst, were he to resign without dissolving, the Conservatives would be unable to govern with the present Chamber, and would have to dissolve themselves, when their programme would be defeated at a General Election. What has particularly angered the Conservatives is that M. Marcora was the Government candidate for the Presidency of the Chamber. He was elected by a very large majority, but his candidature was, I think, a mistake; for he is a Milanese, and is regarded there as the head of the Socialists, who were badly beaten in that town at the last General Election.

Since then Signor Giolitti has found favour with the Conservatives by bringing in a Bill to increase the police force, and clearly announcing that, if any Government employee joins in a strike, he will at once be dismissed. The importance of this declaration is that the extremists have declared the right of such employees to strike, and threatened to use this weapon if they cannot carry their measures, or if the Government carries measures of which they disapprove.

The German courts have decided that to play at poker is not to gamble, because it is a game of skill. In like manner, the French courts decided some years ago that baccarat is not gambling. Skill undoubtedly enters into the former, though very slightly into the latter. A good poker player would probably in the long run win were he always pitted against inferior players. But at any one particular game at poker luck would very much outweigh skill, and to say that it is not a gambling game is absurd. Probably a good many sharp men and women make a living out of bridge, owing to its being possible to play it well or badly. But this is because so many insist on playing it who are not skilled players. Why, however, is it popular? To a certain extent because it is a game of mixed skill and chance; but in ninety-nine cases out of a hundred because of the chance element in it or, in other words, because it furnishes an opportunity to gamble.

I have always agreed with Dr. Johnson that, if two persons like to submit to chance the question which of the two is to have a sum of money, this in no way concerns the State, any more than many other not very wise ways of getting rid of money. The element of chance may furnish as pleasurable an excitement as kicking a football or handling a bat. This can hardly be deemed a harmful pastime. To risk an amount which a person cannot afford to lose is foolish, but not more foolish than to squander money on needless objects that a person cannot afford. I see perpetually doleful complaints of the mania now existing for playing at bridge in season and out of season. But if the greater number of these bridge players were to renounce the game, would they be employed in anything more useful to the community? I think, however, that when there is bridge at some private house the host should always insist on the stakes being reasonable and suitable for small purses, for it may be that some of the guests may otherwise be led to play beyond their means, as they may not have the moral courage to admit that the stakes are too high for their purses. I am not now a great reader of tracts. But there used to be many tracts which traced the execution of some person for murder to his having once played pitch-and-toss for pence. All this is trash.

Mr. Chamberlain and his wirepullers have discovered that Sir John Gorst is not prepared to be hustled out of the Conservative Party so easily as they seem to have anticipated. Mr. Ritchie and Lord George Hamilton have apparently accepted Party ostracism, and do not propose to stand for the constituencies that they now represent at the next General Election. In other cases the recalcitrant has not resisted the decree of divorce between himself and his constituency which has been pronounced by the High Court of Birmingham, whilst in others he has swallowed with a wry face the programme of the Tariff Reform League, in order to be allowed to stand again as a Unionist.

Sir John Gorst represents the university of Cambridge. In the days of the Fourth Party he was the Ulysses of the group. But he was deemed a dangerous man to put in the Cabinet, for, although a Conservative, he was not the man humbly to accept any folly proposed by the Liberal turncoats who had captured the Unionist Party. He was therefore only given a second-rate post. He is one of the most capable speakers in the House; in intelligence head and shoulders above the nonentities and the aristocratic bantlings that have blossomed into Ministers. Moreover, he does not always conceal his contempt of fools in high places. He was Minister of Education, without a seat in the Cabinet. He thoroughly knew his subject, and if the conduct of the Government Education Bill had been left to him in the House of Commons, it would not have been so certain, as it is now, to be a mere temporary measure, for, although a Churchman, he would have placated its opponents by well-timed concessions. But Mr. Balfour insisted upon ignoring him, and taking the conduct of the Bill under his own wing. The next step was to get rid of him by a very clear hint that his room in the Administration was deemed better than his company.

And now it would seem, that a little knot of dons at Cambridge have been induced by the Tariff League to call upon him to sever his Parliamentary connection with the University. He has dared, they say, occasionally to differ from the Unionist Cabinet with which we are now blessed. This, however, is not the real grievance. He has declined to be dragooned into acceptance of Mr. Chamberlain's fiscal revolution. The next thing, I suppose, will be to add an article which will declare faith in Chamberlain to be a dogma of the Established Church, in addition to the existing thirty-nine. Sir John has treated these University jackals of the Birmingham dictator as they deserve. He has told them that he does not recognise their right to speak for his constituents, and that he intends to accept his dismissal from the latter only. I sincerely hope that he will be once more returned, for although I do not agree with him in many of his political views, I think that, if a Conservative is to represent a University, it is well that he should be of ability, great Parliamentary experience, and thoroughly independent of party pressure of the sort which is now being exercised. Those who do not favour University representation in Parliament are numerous, and nothing is more likely to increase their number than this attempt to convert the Universities into Chamberlain pocket boroughs.

THE STUBBORN SIPHON.

One Morn, a parched and thirsty Wight,
Who "chippy" felt from Overnight,
Went to a licensed Grocer's, handy,
And bought a Pint of Cognac Brandy;
To mix wherewith he also bought a
Siphon of sparkling Soda-water.
Then, in a lengthy Tumbler, he Poured, shakily, some Eau-de-vie;
Next, pressed the Siphon Handle's End,
Eager to quaff the grateful Blend.
But, bootless, lo! that Tap he pressed;
Bootless the Thing inversely blest;
In Vain or Oath, or Thumb's Impact;
The stubborn Brute refused to act.
So, in a Passion, up he took it,
And, like a naughty Child, he shook it,
Saying the While: "I 'll make you pour;
You shan't beat me!" Then pressed once more.

It is played by the Irish, It is played by the Scot; The English and Welshmen, they play It a lot; Our Colonial Cousins now play It a bit, And the women and children all rave about Pit; Pit is It, Pit is It, Pit is It, Pit is It, all the women and children now rave about Pit.

Leap from the Glass, with reflex Force,

Cursing, like Mad, his Face he dried,
"Damn you, contrary Beast!" he cried.
"You wouldn't pour at all for long,
And, now you do, you pour too strong!"
"'Twas ever thus," said Siphon, "Sir,
With those that hardest are to stir.
It takes a Lot to make 'em go it;
But, when they do, they let you know it!"

SCRUTATOR.

PRESS PATRIOTS AND THE DARDANELLES.

THE section of the London Press that did its best to drag us into a war over the Dogger Bank incident, and, happily, failed, is now seeking to bring us into collision with Russia over the Treaty of Paris. This treaty embodies an agreement between the European Great Powers neutralising the Black Sea, in the sense that only Turkish ships of war could either leave it or enter it. Certain Russian papers have urged that the Russian Black Sea Fleet should, if the permission of the Sultan can be obtained, pass through the Dardanelles into the Mediterranean. It may be that this is contemplated by the Russian Government or it may not. The Standard, however, threatens Russia with war should such an event take place. Eventually the "Champion Hustler" who now selects its writers and its policy is determined to show that he can beat the war drum as loudly and as recklessly as his rivals in the Harmsworth Press. We are, says the Hustler, bound by our alliance with Japan to maintain the status quo in regard to the Black Sea, and prevent any change which would tell against our ally, for she went to war on the assumption that we would do this. This is trash. Japan was not a party to the Treaty of Paris. It was an agreement between certain of the Great Powers of Europe in their own collective interests. The treaty was joint and not several. The fact that we have a treaty with Japan agreeing to side with her if she be attacked by any two Great Powers imposes on us no obligation to force Russia to stand by the Treaty of Paris in respect of the Black Sea. The Treaty gives no right to any one of the signatories to take action against any other to maintain it intact, but the remedy would have to be collective and international, based on general assent.

The late Lord Derby, when England agreed to join the other Great Powers in neutralising Luxemburg, laid down the principle that this "hands off" could only be enforced by the joint action of all the parties to the agreement. When it was pointed out to him that, if so, the agreement meant nothing, far from denying this, he admitted it. According to him, such treaties are little more than an expression of opinion, and, so far as collective action is concerned, leave to each Power the right to go to war itself to maintain the neutrality, but create no obligation on any Power to do so.

The Hustlers call upon us to make any action on the part of Russia contrary to the Treaty of Paris a casus belli, not only because this might aid the Russians in their war with Japan, but because the neutrality of the Dardanelles is a British interest. I greatly doubt whether it be so. There is a great deal to be said on both sides from the British standpoint. The neutrality of the Dardanelles certainly is not of such vital interest to us that we should be wise to maintain it at the cost of war with any Great Power, if the others are not prepared to aid us. Even if we once had any interest in that direction, circumstances have changed since the Treaty of Paris was signed fifty years ago. Among other things we have discovered since that date that in supporting Turkey against Russia we "put our money on the wrong horse." No Great Power would permanently submit to such a restriction on its natural right to free navigation from its shores to the high seas, as the Treaty of Paris imposes on Russia. We might as well expect Russia permanently to assent to her Baltic Fleet not being allowed to pass through the Sound, even though Sweden and Denmark might assent to the passage. The treaty was imposed on Russia after an unsuccessful war. At that time things were very different from what they are now. Russia was not confronted in the East by a powerful and somewhat aggressive nation in possession of a considerable fleet. We were not in possession of the Suez Canal, nor were Germany, Russia, France, and the United States seeking to share with us the commerce of the Far East. Our chief aim at the present moment should be to localise the Eastern War, and to keep out of it ourselves. We are bound by treaty to side with Japan if any other Great Power sides with Russia. There our obligation towards Japan begins and ends. The fact that the egress of the Russian Fleet from the Black Sea may be advantageous to Russia in her struggle with Japan is entirely outside the question, and if it be absolutely necessary to the Russian naval operations in the Far East, we could not be surprised were she to act on the principle, salus populi suprema lex. If we really believe that the restriction now existing is absolutely vital to us, we ought to go to war to maintain it, even at the cost of converting a local into a general war. But to prove this, something more would be needed than that Sir Alfred Harmsworth, Mr. Pearson, and half a dozen other newspaper proprietors should tell us that it is.

I note that the newspapers which are affiliated to the Tariff Reform League are ever endeavouring to force us into some war. I am inclined to think that this is an attempt to stave off defeat on the tariff issue. They would drag a red-herring—and an exceptionally sanguinary one—across the tariff trail. The Unionist Party used the South African War to retain power, and the more reckless of them would very probably be ready to play the same game again. Fortunately, however, the present Government, although shifty, reckless, and greedy of place, is not quite so unpatriotic as these blatant and fire-eating Press "patriots." I hope that the Japanese will come out the victors in the present war, for there is much that I admire in them, and I should be glad to see Orientals recognised as best fitted to be the masters in their own lands, and no longer bullied and robbed by Western nations, now on one plea, now on another. But neither my admiration nor my desire blinds me to the fact that the Japanese possess a large measure of Oriental acuteness where their own interests are concerned, and that what would suit them by no means necessarily suits us. It is far from improbable that if they find that they are getting the worst in their present struggle with Russia, they will endeavour to convert it into a war in which we may be involved. This may be sound patriotism on their part, and they may hold that the end justifies the means. With all respect to them, however, we must keep our eyes well open to this contingency. We know what our war for the benefit of the cosmopolitan money-grubbers in South Africa has cost us. A war with Russia would be dearer, and, so far as I can see, under no circumstances could any advantage that we might reap from it recoup the outlay. That it might suit Japan is no reason for our engaging in it. Business is business.

NELSONS' WIDOWS:

A Word of Warning.

The position of Nelson and Co.'s pensioners, and of the customers who have contingent interests in the pension fund, has been attracting a great deal of public attention during the last week or two; and it is edifying to see how much anxiety on behalf of those good ladies has developed in unexpected quarters. The halfpenny Press—which for the last three years has manifested no interest in the pension tea business, except as a source of revenue to the advertisement department—has suddenly awoke to the gigantic dimensions of the "ramp" in which it has been participating. It is now overwhelming those of its readers who happen to have been caught by the Nelson advertisements with information and advice, more or less disinterested. An association for the special benefit of Nelsons' Widows has sprung into existence, and is being busily pushed. The Nelson Company itself is anxious to convince its widows that they need no friend but Nelson and Co. And Mr. Emerson Bainbridge has come forward with a personal guarantee for the benefit of the widows, present and prospective, which wears the air of a piece of quite princely munificence. It almost looks as if there was no room for the Editor of Truth in this overpowering muster of widows' friends. It may be, however, that the poor ladies are a little bewildered by the attentions of so many benefactors; indeed, I have evidence that this is so in many personal applications for advice, and, as I am at any rate disinterested in this matter, which some of the other parties are not, I will give Nelsons' widows the benefit of my opinion about their other friends.

We will begin with the "Widows' Pension Protection Society," of Mansion House Chambers, Queen Victoria-street, E.C. Nelson and Co.'s customers have been beset during the last week or so with prospectuses of this concern, and invitations to join it. "Not a moment is to be lost," they are informed, and, in order to save the loss of precious moments, they are supplied with printed postcards, on which they may request to be enrolled as members of the society, and which they may despatch by return of post at the cost of a halfpenny stamp when they have filled in the needful particulars. The society has been formed, it says, "at the request of a number of Nelsons' customers." I should rather like to know who these customers were, and to whom they made their request, for the concern sprang into being with miraculous celerity after the impending feduction of the Nelson pensions had been announced. The objects in view, as specified in the prospectus, are "to provide legal aid if necessary, to enforce payment of pensions to those entitled to same, and above all to secure the continued payment of pensions to all to whom they are due, or may become due." The mere recital of these objects looks sufficient to cause every woman concerned to fill up and return the postcard instantly. But how it is proposed to secure these desirable ends the prospectus does not indicate, beyond mentioning that "eminent lawyers will be retained by this society." Eminent lawyers are not retained for nothing; yet, strange to say, nothing is said in the prospectus about the source from which these legal luminaries are to be paid. The widows themselves are not asked to subscribe—at any rate for the present. An "Honorary Committee" is announced on the prospectus. The only two familiar names upon it are those of Lady Henry Somerset and the Rev. Hugh Chapman. Lady Henry Somerset's name, I am in a position to say, was announced somewhat prematurely; and she is not a member of the committee. Mr. Chapman is hardly a tower of strength in such a position. Of the other committeemen I know nothing, nor does the public; and this may also be said of Mr. R. Fowler, who signs the prospectus as "Honorary Secretary." In point of fact, the real moving spirit in this society is a Mr. Arthur Deakin, who was for a time in the service of Nelson and Co. as head of one of their departments. He left their service in consequence of that particular branch of the business being dropped. The parting was not exactly a friendly one, and Mr. Deakin made claims which the company only partially satisfied. I neither say nor suggest anything against him; but that he should seize the first opportunity of organising a society for the protection of the customers against the directors, and that at the same time he should not allow his own name to appear publicly in connection with the organisation, are facts which have a certain significance.

At any rate, as this society stands at present, I have no hesitation in advising Nelson's customers, widows or not, to have nothing to do with it. Neither the manner in which it has sprung into existence, nor the names of the committee, are such as can inspire confidence for the particular purpose in view. The postcard which the women concerned are asked to sign, and which is addressed to the Hon. Secretary, contains a paragraph in these words: "I authorise you to act on my behalf in such manner as you think fit to protect my interests free of expense to myself." It would manifestly be a most foolish thing of any woman interested in the Nelson pension fund to give an authority of this kind to people of whom she knows nothing; and I say emphatically that a self-constituted organisation of unknown individuals has no right to ask all these women—who, from the nature of the case, must be assumed to be utterly without any knowledge of business matters—to sign a "blank cheque" of this description under a vague promise of "safeguarding their interests." What is the first step that has been taken in that direction? According to an apparently inspired announcement in the Daily Mail of Saturday, two members of the Protection Society's Committee had responded to an invitation to confer with the Nelson directors. One of the delegates chosen for this purpose is the Rev. Hugh Chapman. He is, doubtless, a most estimable clergyman; but I take the liberty of doubting whether either in general business knowledge, or familiarity with the particular business of the Nelson pension scheme, he is any match for the very astute gentlemen whom he will have encountered at this conference. The circular on which the existence of the Protection Society is based assumes a direct antagonism between the Nelson directors and their customers. The directors are represented in it as contemplating steps highly prejudicial to the interests of the customers, and the object of the society is represented as being to resist such steps with the assistance of eminent lawyers. This view of the situation may be right or wrong; but it is a curious way of starting on the realisation of the programme to hold a friendly conference with the board which the society is formed to resist. No one in his senses can expect that the deliberate policy of the Nelson directors will be modified by any representations which the Rev. Hugh Chapman and his colleagues may make in the course of this discussion. Simultaneously with the announcement of this conference, it is stated that members of the Protection Society's committee have been invited to join the board of Nelson and Co. This looks uncommonly like inviting the lamb to lie down inside the lion. The previous relationship between the Nelson board and the presiding genius of the Protection Society may facilitate a friendly understanding between these two bodies. The directors of Nelson and Co. are quite right to establish it if they can. But the very possibility of such a thing is inconsistent with the assumption of antagonistic interests which have to be defended, on which the Protection Society is founded; and the fact that the first move of the society is in this direction makes its professions an absurdity, and justifies the distrust which its origin inspires. If there is no antagonism between the company and its customers which cannot be removed by a little friendly conference, or the admission of a customers' representative to the Nelson board, it follows necessarily that there is no need for the existence of the Protection Society.

I repeat, therefore, my advice to all women concerned to abstain from signing the postcard above mentioned, or connecting themselves in any way with this concern. I go further. I advise them to sign nothing—nothing whatever—in the present state of affairs. As already mentioned in TRUTH, an action has been commenced in the Chancery Division on behalf of certain of the pensioners and other customers interested in the Government Deposit and the pension fund. The High Court of Justice is the true Widows' Pension Protection Association. Whatever decision it pronounces in the action now pending will apply indiscriminately to all concerned, whether parties to the action or not. If any woman now on Nelson and Co.'s books as a pensioner or a customer desires further information or advice, she had better write to the Editor of TRUTH. I confess I am not particularly desirous of entering into correspondence with 700,000 ladies in all parts of the kingdom—the present number of Nelson's customers, according to the latest information. But I would rather do that than leave any of them in the hands of the first enterprising or benevolent gentleman who offers them assistance at the present crisis in the affairs of the company.

So much for that matter. It is also necessary to speak frankly about the "personal guarantee" offered to the customers by Mr. Emerson Bainbridge. In order to do Mr. Bainbridge no injustice I give below the full text of this document as it has been communicated to the Press, and, as the postscript implies, to the customers also:—

PERSONAL GUARANTEE TO NELSON'S WIDOWS AND CUSTOMERS.

To the 19,000 Widows and the 700,000 Customers Associated with the Nelson Pension Scheme.

During the past few weeks many sensational and misleading references have been made to the Nelson Pension Scheme, and no doubt a great deal of uneasiness has been created in the minds of the Nelson customers.

Knowing something of the great help the scheme has been, and may be in the future to people of small means of livelihood (many of whom it has kept out of the workhouse) I have decided to make the following proposition to all who are customers of Nelson and Co., Limited, in order to secure the return to them of all they have put into the scheme. I am prepared for a period of five years (if I so long live) and to the extent of £50,000 (1) to guarantee the whole of the widows now receiving pensions from Nelson and Co., Limited, that they receive back at least the whole of the extra price for tea paid by them to secure a pension during the whole time they have been customers; (2) I will also guarantee the whole of the 700,000 customers (exclusive of widows), who are now buying the tea with a view to receiving pensions in case of widowhood, that they will receive back (in the event of their becoming widows and being entitled to pensions) at least the whole of the extra price for tea paid by them to secure a pension since they have been customers of Nelson and Co. This guarantee is given on the understanding that five-sixths of the present customers continue their association with Nelson and Co., Limited.

For the fulfilment of this guarantee, I will deposit securities to the amount of £50,000 with my bankers. This undertaking on my part will at least secure every one of Nelson's customers against loss. With regard to the future, each customer will now have the option of having either a pension, or, if she joins the Nelson Trading Co., a lump sum at her husband's death. If a pension, this will be derived from a certain percentage of the net profit made by Nelson and Co., and such percentage has recently been increased from 15s. in the £1 to 17s. in the £1. The amount of pensions paid depends upon the amount of net profit made by the company, and the amount of profit made must depend upon the number of Nelson's customers.

I have decided to give this guarantee for the following reasons:—1. Because I wish the customers to be assured that the extra money paid by them for Nelson's tea, to secure a pension, will not be lost to them. 2. Because I know that those who are trying to stop the business are not doing it for the benefit of either the widows or the customers. 3. Because I believe that the present scheme, backed up by the new assurance scheme and the sales of other goods, as already arranged, should continue to be of the greatest benefit to the working classes.

(Signed) Emerson Bainbridge.

December 8, 1904

The customers receiving this should sign it and return it through the company's local agent to the head office.

The first point to be noted in this document is that it is not a guarantee for the payment of the "life pensions" which have been held out to the customers in the company's advertisements, but of something entirely different and absolutely insignificant. It does not "secure every one of Nelson's customers against loss," and Mr. Bainbridge ought not to have used so loose and misleading an expression in so important a document, for the offer only applies to the widows (at present 19,000 in number) and all the rest of the 700,000 customers will continue paying their extra tea-money for nothing. As regards the widows themselves, present or prospective, all that the guarantee promises is that they shall get out of the pension fund all that they have paid to the company in the shape of extra price of tea in order to secure a pension—in other words, that they shall not be out of pocket by their dealings with Nelson and Co. The extra price paid for tea under Nelson's pension scheme may be taken roughly as about 6d. per ½ lb. A woman becomes entitled to the full pension benefit of 10s. per week after buying half a pound of tea every week for twelve months. In the most favourable case to the customer, therefore, the extra amount paid to the company to secure a pension will be £1 6s. In the case most favourable to the company the woman will have been paying for the whole period of the company's existence (three years and a half), which would make her total payments about £4 11s. These figures, therefore, give the least and the greatest amounts that any one can receive under Mr. Bainbridge's guarantee. (There are, I believe, some few women on the books who date from the Jensen era, prior to the formation of the company; but their number is insignificant, and at least six-sevenths of the present customers must have joined within the last two or three years.) All, therefore, that Mr. Bainbridge promises to a woman who has been paying her money in expectation of a "life pension" of 10s. per week is a sum which may not amount to three weeks' pension at that rate, and which cannot be more than ten weeks' pension—except in the case of Jensen's old customers. To every Nelson customer who has received a 10s. pension for ten weeks, or a 5s. pension for twenty weeks, and to many thousands of them who have received it for less periods, Mr. Bainbridge's guarantee is worthless and meaningless, for all such women have already received as much or more than they paid in, and can therefore never have any claim on the guarantee fund. Even within the narrow limits to which it is thus reduced, it is open to doubt whether the £50,000 which Mr. Bainbridge offers to deposit would be under all circumstances sufficient for its purpose. I suppose that this sum was arrived at upon some calculation of the number of widows who are likely to come upon the pension fund during the next five years, and the probable amount that they will have paid in previously. I have no materials myself for making any such calculation, and the position is too complicated and uncertain for any guess at the probable liabilities in the event of the payment of pensions being entirely suspended during the next five years. But one or two facts are certain. In the first place, if the company has now 19,000 widows on its books from among customers of upwards of one year's standing, that number must be doubled or trebled in the next five years, even from the present 700,000 customers to whom the guarantee is limited. In the next place, £50,000 will only suffice to pay £2 10s. per head to 20,000 women, or not much more than the existing number of pensioners. That is to say, if in the course of five years more than 20,000 widows should come on the fund who have been subscribing for two years or upwards, and it is highly probable that they will, £50,000 would not suffice to repay all their subscriptions. The amount can only be sufficient for the purpose if Nelson and Co. should be able to go on paying pensions to all its widows for several years to come, so that the number who will not have received back in pensions as much as they paid in will be very considerably reduced. I do not myself believe that there is the slightest probability of that result being arrived at.

It is not worth while, however, to labour these points. A far more important matter is the object for which this delusive guarantee is now dangled before the noses of the 700,000 customers of Nelson and Co., Ltd. That object is evident on the face of the document. It is hoped by thus indemnifying all the customers against any actual loss on their contracts with the company to retain at least 600,000 out of the 700,000 on the books, and thereby to keep the business afloat a little longer on its present basis. On that view of the matter it is difficult to condemn Mr. Bainbridge's move too strongly. What is the position of the company at the present moment? It has paid the promised pensions in full for the last time. On December 9 it gave notice to the widows that the existing pensions are reduced by one-half. It is faced by an ever-increasing load of liabilities which—in the absence of extended supplies of new dupes, of which under the circumstances there is little prospect—will involve further reductions of the pensions at no distant date. The directors can no longer have the slightest doubt—if they ever had any—that the promises by which the greater part of the existing customers have been obtained are utterly delusive, and that the life of the pension fund, even on its reduced basis, is now measured by months. It is in this state of things that Mr. Bainbridge comes forward with a scheme the whole scope and purport of which is to induce these 700,000 women, ignorant women every one of them, into buying tea from Nelson and Co. at the present price a little longer. Left to themselves, the overwhelming majority of them, as everybody can see, would recognise the deception that has been practised upon them, and "cut their loss," declining to throw good money after bad. To prevent them taking that course, what does Mr. Bainbridge say? "Keep on buying your tea at the present rates, and I will personally indemnify you against loss—provided you become widows within five years." He knows—nobody better—that the percentage of women to whom this promise applies is insignificant. For all but a few thousand out of the 700,000 the result can only be that they will go on paying their 6d. a week to Nelson and Co. without the slightest chance of either getting their money back or getting any benefit for the expenditure. Nevertheless, he does not hesitate to tell the whole 700,000 that the offer he is making "will at least secure every one of Nelson's customers against loss." At the moment of going to press, I see a calculation by "an actuarial authority" in the Daily Mail, which reckons that if 583,331 customers (that is to say, 600,000 less the widows) go on buying tea at the present rate, they will pay among them, in "extra price," or insurance premiums alone, £291,666 per annum. It is to obtain such a result that this delusive "guarantee" is offered. Bearing in mind the class of women to whom the offer is made, it is difficult to condemn it too strongly. It is in principle no better than the offer of "life pensions" on which the pension tea business has been built up. To men of business the exact value of either offer may be evident enough, but to the women whose money is to be thus obtained the thing is certain to present itself in a very different light; at any rate, it will not be Mr. Bainbridge's fault if it does not.

Mr. Emerson Bainbridge cannot complain that he has been harshly dealt with in Truth. In all my criticism of the Nelson business he has had the fullest benefit of everything that could be said in his favour. He has had the fullest credit—some people say too much—for the part he took in the recent reconstitution of the board, and the attempts that have been made to put the business on a more honest footing. I have given the fullest prominence to his assertions that for a year and a half before the reconstruction of the board he had vainly exerted himself to get the advertisements modified: the customers' contracts recast, and the division of the profits altered in favour of the customers; and on the strength of these things, I have credited him with a perception that the business with which he was connected was not an honest one, and with a sincere desire to give it a different character. But I am bound to say that this last move, for which the sole responsibility must rest upon him, is no better than any of the earlier proceedings from which he has sought to dissociate himself. The ugliest feature of it is that the person who stands to gain most by it, with the possible exception of Mr. J. M. Catton, is Mr. Bainbridge himself. Of course, it will be said that if the 700,000 customers can be induced to go on buying their tea at Nelson's prices for a few weeks or months longer, the existing widows will get their pensions out of what is thus paid. If that were all, it would merely be a case of robbing Peter to pay Paul. But "Paul" in this case includes a great deal more than the widows who may get a few more shillings out of the plundered "Peter" before the game finally stops. Not only will 15 per cent. of the profits of this plunder go to the Nelson shareholders, of whom Messrs. Catton and Bainbridge are the chief, but the principal part of the profits of these gentlemen is derived from their commission on the sale of tea to the company, which goes on undiminished as long as the number of customers on the books remains undiminished, however much the pensions may be cut down. What the profits under this head amount to readers of Truth already know; and it may be safely said that if, as the result of Mr. Bainbridge's professed guarantee, five-sixths of the present customers continued buying Nelsons' tea for another twelve months, the gain to Mr. Bainbridge would far exceed any liability that he is ever likely to incur under that document. When the impending reduction of the pensions was first mentioned in Truth last month, I said unhesitatingly that there was one way, and one only, in which Mr. Bainbridge and his partner Mr. Catton could put themselves right with public opinion, and that was by refunding to the unfortunate women who supposed that they were buying from them a provision against widowhood all the profits that they have themselves made out of that delusion. Now that the impossibility of the continued payment of the pensions is proved up to the hilt, there cannot be a shadow of excuse for continuing to receive further payments from women for the purchase of pensions. The only straightforward course is to let the pension business die a natural death, even if that involves the decease of Nelson and Co. at the same time. If Mr. Bainbridge recognises, as he ought to do, and as by the offer of this guarantee he purports to do, that on the collapse of the business it is incumbent on him to see that no customer is out of pocket by her dealings with Nelson and Co., let him pay them off in cash now and close the account. What he has chosen to do is something very different. He seeks, by making a show of indemnifying everybody against loss, to extract further payments to an enormous amount, in return for which nothing substantial is ever likely to be obtained, while securing a corresponding addition to the profits he has already made. The attempt is the more odious because it is disguised in the shape of an act of disinterested munificence, and flavoured with nauseous cant about the good work that this gigantic ramp has already done in keeping poor widows out of the workhouse.

The advice I have given above to the Nelson customers against signing any document submitted to them by benevolent friends at this juncture, applies, I need not say, with especial force to this communication from Mr. Emerson Bainbridge. The proposed guarantee is altogether delusive, and I trust it will prove abortive. I take the liberty of adding a word of advice to those newspapers which have at last discovered the true bearings of the pension-tea scheme, and are now tardily endeavouring to give their readers some practical insight into the matter. It is that they should study what has been said above, and in previous issues of Truth, and abstain from bestowing their impulsive approval on schemes for the benefit of Nelsons' customers about which they know little or nothing. This has already been done in more than one instance during the past week. I beseech some of my junior contemporaries not to allow their tails to be salted. The Press has contributed largely through its advertisement columns to the blowing up of the pension-tea bubble to the point at which it burst. It may do something now to repair the mischief, but that will only be by exercising a little common sense based upon full and accurate information about the facts.

THE THEATRES.

"Pagliacci," at the Savoy.

Mr. Gilbert Hare and Mrs. Brown-Potter have continued their privateering excursions into opera, for now is appended to the picturesque remnants of "Cavalleria Rusticana" the not less picturesque costumes and environment of "Pagliacci." Remnants of the music of this as of the other opera are also commandeered to eke out the dialogue and fill up chinks generally. Despite the admirable conducting of Mr. Raymond Roze, I question whether Signor Leoncavallo and Signor Mascagni will be tempted to sip their own wines in their present mutilated form. Mr. Charles Brookfield has been called in to operate (the exact word!) upon "Pagliacci." He has done so, sparing not the knife, yet lavish enough of his own particular balsam which he pours into the wounds, even prefixing a prologue in rhyme, where we are told that although the play is but a play, yet beneath their rouge and patches the players speak the soul of things. Vaguely I seem to have heard a similar thought before; certainly I did not want to hear it before "Pagliacci." Mr. Brookfield rhymes also the comedy parts of the dialogue of the play, and, for what they are, his rhymes are deftly enough turned, but the diction is altogether unsuitable to the passionate village folk and strolling players of Calabria; to Canio the jealous husband; to Silvio, the lover; or to Tonio, the evil genius of the work. Such writing as Mr. Brookfield here gives us would be exactly in the note of the prologue to the entertainment during Canterbury week. Nervous prose would have gone far more near to the original.

Mr. Charles Warner has his full fling as the amorous and jealous husband who stabs his wife on the stage, and his emotional utterance found its familiar echo in the applause of a part of the audience. Mr. Jerrold Robertshaw, as the lover, is natural and quite in the right note, Mr. Gilbert Hare excellently sinister as Tonio, the detestable clown. One sees why Mrs. Brown-Potter prefers this sort of production to legitimate drama. It gives her a better opportunity of revealing her good, and to some extent concealing her bad, qualities. From the pictorial point of view, indeed, nothing could have been more exquisite than her beautiful head, with its disordered auburn tresses, as she lies prostrate on the inner stage at the end of the play within the play. This wonderful head and face are turned away from the audience, and, being slightly inclined below the horizontal level, resemble nothing in the world so much as the head of the Medusa. One felt the little serpents were writhing in that beautiful hair. And the Watteauesque ballet skirts, all silver sprinkled—the whole effect was a triumph, as I say, from the pictorial standpoint. But Mrs. Brown-Potter remains as incapable as ever of speaking dialogue naturally; she is always awaiting the moment when, after uttering two or three peacock screams, she may either fall into the arms of her lover, be assassinated by her husband, or at any rate accomplish some action worthy of a paragraph in the Daily Mail. Here the use of music comes in opportunely, and one may employ a phrase, vulgar but appropriate to the expression of its function. I refer to that conclusion affixed to certain anecdotes by their tellers: "And then the band played." One does not regret it.

Herr Eric Hartleben's trilogy of one-act plays produced at the German Theatre on Monday is an interesting attempt to effect a unity of purpose between three plays essentially differing in plot. The trilogy is followed by the light military comedy "Militarfromm." To-morrow (Thursday) the farce in four acts, "Die goldene Spinne," will be given for the first time.

The Mermaid Society's performance of "The Maid's Tragedy" has added another leaf to the crown of real laurels which it has won by its courageous endeavour.

The Crystal Palace announces as its Christmas Pantomime "The Babes in the Wood." This performance, I am assured, in the matter of mounting and stage properties, will be "a scene of beauty as far beyond the dreams of a nursery myth as it is possible for the inventive genius of the up-to-date stage-manager to make it." There is a delightful element of unconscious comicality about this statement. Poor Hans Andersen! Poor Grimm! You must hide your poor little imaginations, for a greater than you has undertaken to deal with myths of childhood: no less a person than the "up-to-date stage-manager." But I have no doubt that, in spite of all this, the performance will be worthy of the Crystal Palace; and one could not give it higher praise. The Crystal Palace will also produce a circus, which will occupy the central transept, and besides the ring for the equestrians there will be no less than three separate stages forming the background of the house. Artists engaged include the Tokyo Japs and the Russian Equestrians (the management does not say whether these are to enter fighting), the Powell Family, and "a small army of clowns."

Last Saturday evening Mrs. O'Hagan gave a very pleasant entertainment in her little theatre in Courtfield Gardens. The first of the two plays was Mr. W. S. Gilbert's "Comedy and Tragedy." Mrs. O'Hagan herself took the difficult part of Clarice, and showed great imaginative as well as histrionic skill in those transitions from grave to gay for which the play is so well known. Her tragic scene at the close was especially notable. Among the other personages of the drama those of D'Aulnay and of the Duc d'Orléans stand out in clear relief, and it is in no small degree to the credit of Mr. Charles Bryant (familiar to the public in "Iris") that he did so well with the former, as it is to Mr. J. G. Meade to have succeeded in the latter part. As Clarice's sister I noted with pleasure the playing of Miss Georgie

Financial Protection for Families or Provision for Old Age. The public is invited to apply for the new Prospectus of the Scottish Widows' Fund. Funds £17,000,000. Participating Life Assurances by Annual Premiums effected before December 31st next, will, at the next Division of Profits (1908) rank for Five years' Bonus Additions. Applications for such Assurances should not be delayed. 28, Cornhill, E.C., and 5, Waterloo Place, S.W.

Joss and of Mr. Jolliffe Walker as Doctor Choquart. "A Pantomime Rehearsal," the second of the plays, is always a favourite. Mr. Raynes's Lord Arthur was a pleasant reflection of Mr. Grossmith's manner, and Miss Gladys O'Hagan made Lily bright and charming in word, in dance, and in song. Her duet with Miss Mendelssohn (Violet) was especially successful. Miss Florrie Whistler's whistling solo was much appreciated, and there was merit in the performances of Mr. Corbin as Jack Deeds, of Mr. Burford Morrison as Captain Tom Robinson, of Miss Joss as Lady Muriel, and of Captain Dickson as Sir Charles Grandison.

NOTES FROM PARIS.

"GYP" DRAMATISED

"LE FRIQUET" scored its hundredth representation at the Gymnase last Thursday. No play ever seemed to promise less to a clever manager than this adaptation by Willy of Gyp's story. Its prospects looked so poor that steps had been taken to replace it by some other novelty in case of a discouraging reception. To the delightful astonishment of authors, manager, and players, "Le Friquet" became at once the furore, and may run on through the whole winter. Its success is entirely due to Mlle. Polaire, who sprang up, as did Thérésa, from the paving stones of Paris. She sang in cafés chantants, and had some admirers, but no great vogue. Willy's attention was called to her, and he went to hear her sing, and became a devotee. He rightly judged that rare talent lay behind her singeries and that she would draw in an adaptation he was preparing of Gyp's queer story. Polaire has the agility and lightness of a winged insect, a mouth from ear to ear, a waist no thicker than your cane. She can express more sentiment, emotion, whimsicality, wild impishness, and energy than a whole band of Tsigane musicians. Her audacity is only held in check by the nicest stage tact. This creature can be touching to the point of pathos. She saw in childhood and growing girlhood every depth of misery, and grew familiar with the grim tragedy that haunts the dwellings of the poor. Her old impressions must start up in her like the hammers of a piano when the fingers of a Paderewski run over the keys. The head is almost too large for the threadpaper body, but must be a brimful reservoir of vitality. Old Bonapartists who see her at the Gymnase are reminded of a certain ambassadress who in her prime ruled the Court of the Tuileries, and with truth declared herself pire que jolie. But that very grand lady had no eyes to speak of, and had rather impudence, that verged on impudeur, than audacity. Her plainness, save at those dinners of the Empire where fine wines flowed freely, had an unpleasant effect, and the singularly wide mouth struck one as gourmande. Polaire's ugliness is beauty transposed, and her eyes can blaze like carbuncles. In being risky she conveys the idea of the innocence of Eve before the fall. I really think Mlle. Schneider as La Mariée d'Ici is surpassed by Polaire.

This gutter flower, or gutter sparrow, is supposed to be Le Friquet, an imp still girlish, wild and chaste, who has been a circus "utility." She is a being of instinct. The spirit of self-sacrifice without a grain of saintliness is strong in her. Each of the four acts gives a different side of her very complex nature, which is seemingly so simple. We see in her a sort of Cigale, then a young lady, the adopted daughter of vulgar and thickly-gilded bourgeois. In the third act she dreams her love-dream, a state that comes on the spectator as a surprise, and is full of interest. One could no more have imagined a Topsy falling in love than Le Friquet, and few heroines of romance could be so pathetic when she suffers from the stings of an unrequited passion and of jealousy. She sees no cure for heartache without becoming a monster of ingratitude, a solution repugnant to her generous and loyal nature. Naturally she has fallen in love with the wrong man, Hubert de Gange, and rejects the honest adoration of Bauge, a sculptor who has lately passed his fiftieth birthday, and has the dignified portliness of his age. Her death is one of the most touching scenes the French stage has produced. Polaire in the death scene rises above the Dame aux Camélias, or Frou-frou, as rendered by Desclée. She owes nothing to sumptuosity. Nor does the play, as all the interest is bound up in Polaire.

Le Friquet is the only personage of any account. We first see her behind the scenes of Jacobson's wandering circus. Jacobson is not declared a Jew, but he and his haute école écuyère smell of the brimstone with which Gyp likes to sprinkle the Chosen People. Le Friquet (sometimes called Friquette) is a foundling. Mafflu, the clown, picked her up an infant in swaddling clothes in a field, pitied her, and took her home, and found a nurse for her in a learned goat which communicated to the nursling some of its capriciousness and wilful ways. Her liveliness suggested the name she goes by in the circus. Bouches inutiles have no more business there than in a besieged city. The agility of Friquet and her whimsicality make her a valuable adjunct to Jacobson's company, to the pride and delight of the good Mafflu. But all that is bright has in this world its dark side. Friquet's success excited the jealousy of the haute école rider who reigns over the manager. Tired of snubs and rebuffs and fines, the poor foundling makes up her mind to run away and to appeal to the friendship of Hubert de Gange and Bauge. Hubert is a provincial beau, and mayor of the rural commune where the circus has halted to take advantage of local fêtes. Bauge is a visitor at the château of the wealthy banker Schlemmer, whom Willy has debaptised and to whom in the play he gives the name of Claparon and a Christian varnish. De Gange and Bauge have been chance admirers of Le Friquet. They receive her well enough. But De Gange is thinking of the opulent beauty of Mme. Claparon. Bauge is not in his own home. Both, however, promise to do what they can for her. They persuade Mme. Claparon, who is vain and not devoid of generosity, that the active and generous patronage of genius under a cloud becomes the grande dame. Claparon, who slily admires the circus-girl, has no objection, and proposed that his wife should adopt her. Friquet has brought nothing from the circus but the clothes on her back and a spring knife that Mafflu gave her as a parting souvenir. He used it in simulating suicide to stab a wine bag hidden under his motley garments.

We next have Le Friquet nature, in fashionable dress with marvellous dessous, but retaining her circus vocabulary and frankness. The friends of M. and Mme Claparon who come on visits to their château are generally nouveaux enrichis. Le Friquet does her best to become a young lady, and is not aware of her mistakes and solecisms until she finds herself laughed at. She has not in the wealthy riff-raff a single friend save her protectress. Bauge, who becomes a reserved adorer, is not rich. Claparon's passion is enterprising. Madame winks at it. She hopes that he may become too busy with Le Friquet to notice the gallant attentions she herself receives from the fatuous De Gange. The wild flower under her care, in love with him, nearly breaks her heart when the liaison is forced on her attention. De Gange has been acquainted with the opulent beauty before her marriage, which might be termed a sale by her needy father and mother. The husband appears at a disadvantage in his château beside De Gange. Friquet's delicate nature prompts her to absent herself from the salon each time M. le Maire calls on Mme. Claparon. When she slips away into the park, Bauge converses with her pour le bon motif. This bores her. A visit from Mafflu rouses her drooping spirits. He cannot believe the elegantly-attired young lady can be the circus gamine. To prove her identity and find an outlet for her joy she performs the "wheel" exercise with incredible agility.

Bauge offers marriage to Le Friquet. She refuses, but accepts a present of money to provide for Mafflu and to keep in another circus her horse Charlemagne. When she suddenly quits the château to look for an engagement at Le Nouveau Cirque she takes these two old friends with her. Though still a utility, she finds herself a star. Le Friquet in a haute école and in a trapeze performance takes the country town by storm. The Claparons, Bauge, and De Gange come in their autocar to her. Her former protectress visits her in her dressing-room. She whispers to the star to retain Claparon there as long as she can when he comes to see her. The reason you may suspect, De Gange being of the Claparon party. As to Bauge, he wanders round the stables. Claparon has been concealed behind a screen. He thinks of divorce and marriage with Le Friquet, and rushes to clasp her in his arms. She, in the most natural and matter-of-course way, stabs him with Mafflu's knife, and then answers to the call-boy. After a short interval a cry of horror is heard, and the star reappears, but this time she is carried in by Bauge and De Gange and poor Mafflu, who sobs and pours forth verbal lamentations. She is in her green tights. It appears that in the trapeze part of the business she casts her eyes at the box of Mme. Claparon, saw her and De Gange in sentimental conversation, and missed the crossbar, and in her fall met with fatal injuries. She dies with a grace and pathos that bring tears to eyes and turn the spectators into votaries. When the curtain falls all feel sorry that the flimsy play is ended.

The Nationalists look with the mind of a Gaboriau or a Sue at the sudden death of M. Syveton. Coppée cries aloud that his friend's death is a crime of the Freemasons. They knew he would be acquitted by any Paris jury, and so got rid of him. The poet's words are taken up and echoed by Jules Lemaître, Léon Daudet, and the whole band of their friends in the Chamber of Deputies. Had he died at night in his bed, the assertions and insinuations that Combes or the Freemasons suffocated him with gas might stand water. But he must have died at about one o'clock in the afternoon, in a flat facing a busy thoroughfare, and as his wife helped to prepare a delayed déjeuner. The servants had been given orders to admit no visitor whatsoever. Syveton wanted to prepare his speech for the trial, which was to begin next day before the assize court. He took the precaution against disturbance of having the receivers of his telephone taken off. Mme. Syveton repeated to the concierge the instructions given to the servants. No visitor had been allowed to ascend to the Syvetons' flat. Two called, and were sent away, though the concierge knew them to be intimate friends. Some fellow-deputies of Syveton at first imagined that he had committed suicide by letting on the gas until it filled his study. He might have done so to bother the Government by giving his party a corpse. In a moment of angry brooding impulse he would stop at nothing. In this respect he resembled Ravachol, the anarchist, also a native of the Forez district. No other part of France produces so many cranks. Harsh, arrogant, headlong in their resentment, and prone to nurse their grievances, they easily run into fanaticism and are generally men of action. Dupuis, who trumped up the claim for 15,000,000 fr. against the Mandarin Government of Tonquin came from the Forez part of the Loire. So did Lafayette and the late Duc de Persigny.

As the old legend of M. Félix Faure's "assassination" is again cropping up, I may mention some facts with which I became acquainted the day after his death. The President had been dining with Mlle. S——, an actress of rare beauty—of course, in the strictest incognito. According to one report, he was actually dead when he was brought back to the Elysée. This is not true. I learnt all about the last moments of M. Félix Faure in a curious way. A few hours before his death a medical student of my acquaintance told me casually that he was expecting country relatives that week, and he would take them to a ball at the Elysée. A friend of his, Dr. Humbert (of Rambouillet, I think), had a brother, a captain, attached as orderly to the military household of President Faure. The Doctor had applied for tickets to his brother the day before, and was going that evening to the Elysée to fetch them, after which he and the medical student had agreed to dine together at a Rue Royale restaurant.

The Doctor, on sending in his card to his brother at the Elysée, was immediately received. (The medical student came and told me the whole story on the day following.) Captain Humbert caught his brother by the sleeve and dragged him down a corridor. "You are the only medical man in the house; come at once, there is something seriously the matter with the President." The Doctor saw M. Faure lying on a mattress in his room, in a state of collapse, probably from heart rupture. Stimulants (sparteine, etc.) were injected hypodermically, although there was no hope. Dr. Humbert had done everything he could when the shining lights of the Academy of Medicine, called by telephone, made their appearance. They took possession of their patient without addressing a single word to the general practitioner who had committed the crime of being on the spot when help was wanted. They affected even to ignore his presence. Dr. Humbert, finding himself treated as an intruder and almost a trespasser, and suspecting they wanted the advertisement such a "case" would give them, put on his hat and walked out. At the Rue Royale restaurant he had to explain to the medical student why he was nearly an hour late, and thus it was I came to know about the last moments of Félix Faure.

LETTER FROM THE LINKMAN.

THE New World, dear Lady Betty, is no longer only on the other side of the Atlantic; it is a new world everywhere to-day. Especially is it that in this country, where the influences of the institutions and developments of the English-speaking peoples in the United States and the self-governing Colonies are naturally first felt.

Here, nevertheless, our leaders are obstinately endeavouring to keep the donkey-cart before the motor-car!

We live in a new world, and there has developed a new danger, which is that in England we are all educated now but the educated classes.

The ordinary well-connected English boy is sent to a celebrated public school, where he is surrounded with magnificent buildings, and they, together with traditions that have accumulated for centuries, enable the masters to shape him after a pattern which generation upon generation of our predecessors have labelled "A gentleman." At such a school the first object is to cast him in the many-century-old college mould; the second, to instruct him. But is a "gentleman" to-day merely a courteous, classical-minded man, who never offends against the upper-ten commandments?

It is assumed that this boy will have enough money, or influence, to enable him to pass through life more or less smoothly, and that his store of knowledge will not be the main material which he will have to use to earn a livelihood.

Little has changed at the public schools; almost everything has elsewhere.

The ordinary upper-lower or middle-class boy is sent to a more modern school to acquire as much knowledge as he can assimilate. He is told by his parents, and the masters, that the knowledge he accumulates here will be his chief means of earning a livelihood, and, in these days, may help him to rise to the higher rungs of the social ladder. He works strenuously, and the masters earnestly with him, he wins prizes, passes examinations, and even obtains scholarships. The masters, moreover, being aware that his store of knowledge will be his main capital, teach him particularly those modern developments which will be useful to him, especially at the beginning of his career.

At the one class of school it is manners first, mind second; at the other, mind first, manners second.

The two men are launched into the outside world eventually, the first shaped after a pattern which was, probably, admirably designed for times when only the few had any education, when knowledge was a form of polish, not necessary for practical purposes in every direction; when there were no competitive examinations; when most of the employment under Government was given to favourites or supporters; and when the bulk of the influence or money was in the hands of the upper class; the other, soundly, and highly, educated. The new danger is that, whilst the upper-class men have the titles and the honourable traditions, claim to govern the country, and cling to power obstinately, arguing, as they did centuries ago, that it is their right to manage public affairs because they are the educated men, it will soon be obvious to the whole community that they are ignorant and unintelligent.

"But we shall soon change the system at our public schools." That is possible, but there will be no alteration in the "tone." Where it is unbecoming to be poor and studious, there, to the end, application will be discouraged. Moreover, most of the boys who go to those schools are the sons of well-to-do parents. "In any case, for generations we have provided the men who have ruled the country." That is true, but they were the men for whom the opportunities, and the appointments, were reserved; it is comparatively easy to make a great name when placed in a great position.

That thought branches off here in this direction. It appears to have escaped attention that the upper-class man is rapidly taking less and less interest in politics. A hundred and fifty years ago the ordinary upper-class man in this country had comparatively little to do, and less to occupy his mind. Did he live in London, for instance, there was the Mall in St. James's Park to walk in; there were the few theatres; there were the clubs and gambling; and politics. The poets or prose writers wrote political satires or treatises; there were many shops in the West End the windows of which were filled with political caricatures; there were hundreds of political pamphlets published every year; the clergyman in the pulpit was often a political partisan; the club was a centre, generally, of political activity; and it must not be forgotten that the ordinary well-connected man in those days had much to hope for from his political allies—power, place, advancement, pensions, sinecures, concessions, and bribes.

His successor, however, can obtain little or nothing from the Government, and has a thousand private interests to attend to. His time and his mind are fully occupied. He has investments in different undertakings throughout the world, and every item of news may directly or indirectly affect one or the other of them. He is compelled to endeavour to make money; has, probably, to be at an office in the City. He visits friends in every part of the country; has an enormous acquaintance to cultivate; and travels to the remotest end of the earth. See how this decreasing interest in political matters in this direction has affected the production of political poetry, prose treatises, pamphlets, caricatures; has moderated the political bitterness which existed in the ordinary club and "society": and has diminished the importance of the political "leading article."

The successful, or would-be successful, middle-class man, however, now endeavours to take a prominent part in the political struggle, for by that means he may get into touch with a Minister, and may obtain a Knighthood, a Baronetcy, or a Peerage, any of which titles will "establish" him. What contempt, what unmerited disrespect, what inconveniences, he has had to endure through life as Mr. Smithers the manufacturer or tradesman! What respect he will at once command as Sir Onesiphorus Smithers!

On every side, therefore, the well-connected men are dropping off the topmost branches of the social tree in England, and with them must inevitably go the institutions, abuses, and privileges which had been established, and are maintained, mainly for their benefit. We are in the throes of a revolution, and no one attends to it!

At some of the theatres they lower the lights whilst they change the scenery; so we seem to be in darkness whilst the social and political stages are being re-arranged.

The British public is satiated with sensationalism. Mr. Joseph Chamberlain had carefully studied the road over which he was to drive his Protection coach to the point he had in view. At every yard he had posted his adherents. He had, however, never imagined that the British public would not take any interest in the journey, and, after all, without their co-operation it must become a funeral procession. The British public has developed so great a love for "The Short Story" in real life that it will not attend to the three-volume novel—to change the metaphor. "Terrible Slaughter," "Horrible Discovery," "Appalling Accident," "Marylebone Mystery," "Crisis in the City," or "Society Scandal," that is the style of news which alone can now attract public attention in this country—short, sensational, and not requiring any great effort to assimilate. The Anti-Free Trade campaign, like the Russo-Japanese war, is of the three-volume order, and both have long ago ceased to excite interest. The fall of Port Arthur will re-direct attention on the latter; the fall of Arthur Balfour might revive interest in the former.

In a fortnight from this date the annual exhibition at the galleries of Messrs. Thomas Agnew and Sons will close, and those who have not yet seen the twenty-two magnificent pictures contained in the collection should do so at once. There are two works by Gainsborough, side by side, which show that artist at his best in portrait painting and in landscape, and there is a picture by Crome that is one of the most celebrated works by this master. The profits of the winter exhibition are, as has been the case annually for the last ten years, handed by the Messrs. Agnew to the Council of the Artists' General Benevolent Institution.—Believe me to be, very truly yours,

MARMADUKE.

SPORTING NOTES.

THE only really good racing during the "back-end" period was seen at Liverpool and at Derby. The Aintree meeting has lost ground of late years, since the resurrection of Derby. In the sixties and early seventies Shrewsbury was the most successful of all the late autumn fixtures, but it suddenly dropped out, and the course is now covered with houses. Racing was carried on at Shrewsbury from noon until dark on five days, and the meeting was sometimes extended over the Saturday. Fully half the events were gambling races, and the betting was enormously heavy. An animal would often be backed to win from £10,000 to £20,000 over a paltry £50 plate. The "enterprise" of Mr. John Frail was boundless, and one season he started a race for yearlings, the distance being two furlongs. There was a large entry, and a good field came to the post. The winner was the late Lord Stamford's Little Lady, and the betting was so extensive that he won £22,000 over the race. Little Lady was not injured by being so prematurely raced, as she afterwards won a number of T.Y.C. events, and at the stud she became the dam of Camballo, who was a horse of the highest class, and Matthew Dawson could remember nothing better than his trial with Thunder before the Two Thousand of 1875, which he won for the late Mr. Clare Vyner. Races were most audaciously "got up" at Shrewsbury for the relief of defeated plungers by the obliging C.C. if necessary, and there is an amusing account of how one of these "retrievers" was managed in Mr. Hodgman's "Fifty Years on the Turf." Early in the seventies Mr. Frail resolved to endow the Great Shropshire Handicap with £500, and the same amount was given to the Shrewsbury Cup, the one race being run over a mile, and the other over two miles. At the same time he devised the £3 entrance system, which has since been so largely extended. This device originated with the Shrewsbury Handicap. While the Shrewsbury fixture is gone and forgotten, Warwick stills drags on, but this meeting is only the ghost of the shadow of what it was in the days of the late Mr. S. Merry. Warwick arrangements were even more harum-scarum than were those of Shrewsbury, and such handicaps as were produced by the C.C. were never seen anywhere else, and have certainly never been seen since his demise. Several of Mr. Merry's handicaps were "cups" of various values, but he had no idea of parting with the pieces of plate, and when Captain Machell won a cup he only succeeded in obtaining possession after a prolonged wrangle and a threat of an appeal to the Stewards of the Jockey Club. Handicaps at these meetings were always compiled on the "flattering" system. A man, looking first for his own horse, found the animal thrown in with a ridiculous weight, and was delighted. His joy, however, did not endure for long, as directly he glanced over the weights he found that half a dozen other horses at least were still more favourably treated. Everything in those days was thoroughly chaotic, as meetings were not licensed, and the C.C. was able to pocket all profits derived from the races, including the surplus over the advertised value of any event. At Warwick, as at Shrewsbury, an extra day was sometimes added to the meeting, and additional races over and above the number which had been advertised in the Calendar were a regular thing. On the concluding day the races would commence at eleven o'clock in the morning. Meetings which disappear are quickly forgotten, and in a year or two very few people will remember what an important place Northampton filled in the Calendar when the Spencer Plate was a spring Stewards' Cup, the Great Northamptonshire Stakes was one of the most important of the spring handicaps, and the Althorp Park Stakes was a race over which £20,000 could be won by betting at the post. There were then large parties for the races at Althorp, Deene, Kimbolton, Fawsley, and other country houses in the neighbourhood; and it was the first real blow to the meeting when these hospitalities were discontinued. At the present time Derby owes a great debt of gratitude to the Duke of Devonshire and to Lord Burton, whose immense race parties at Chatsworth and at Rangemore are of enormous benefit to the meeting.

I referred last week to the entries for the Two Thousand and the One Thousand for 1906. The fact that these events continue to flourish proves that at the present time owners are pervaded by a morbid fondness for running for their own money. It is not likely, however, that this state of affairs will long continue. The forfeits for the Two Thousand actually amount to £4,000 as the race now stands, while those for the One Thousand are £4,300. For starting any animal which has been entered an extra payment of £50 must be made. Of course, these are rich men's races, but the contrast between the conditions of the great English three-year-old stakes and those of the principal French events is decidedly startling. If the Newmarket authorities followed the Protectionist policy which finds favour in France, we should see foreign horses excluded from these events, and in that case next year's Two Thousand would be an exceptionally open race, but as matters stand it appears to be at the mercy of whichever of M. E. Blanc's colts (Jardy and Val d'Or) he may think fit to start at Newmarket.

Mr. King's colt Comedian, by Orme out of Blare, who was certainly one of the best two-year-olds of last season, has been mentioned lately in connection with the Derby. Comedian was entered for the Derby, but the colt was unluckily withdrawn from this race when the minor forfeit was declared on March 29. This was a most unfortunate blunder. Comedian is mentioned for the Two Thousand, and he will no doubt undergo a special preparation for the Newmarket Stakes at the Second Spring meeting. He is engaged in the St. Leger.

I hear that Cicero has been doing very well at Newmarket during the last few weeks, and he appears to have already made a considerable improvement. He is entered for the Newmarket Biennial, but he will no doubt be reserved for the Newmarket Stakes, and perhaps Lord Rosebery may decide to keep him for the Derby. Cicero won his races easily, but he never beat any animal of much merit, and I do not believe that he will be found capable of defeating either of the French colts which are engaged in the Derby.

A writer in the Sportsman, discoursing upon El Diablo, asserts that he was "the second-best horse of his year, and once upon a time he beat Orme." If El Diablo was "the second-best horse of his year" (Orme being the first), perhaps the writer will be good enough to explain how it came about that he was unplaced in the Two Thousand to Bona Vista and St. Angelo, and that he was then fit and well is proved by the fact that he started first favourite for that race. El Diablo, "the second-best horse of his year," according to this wiseacre, was again unplaced in the Derby to Sir Hugo and La Flèche. Next day he ran nowhere in the race for the Epsom Grand Prize, there being a field of exceedingly poor class. In the St. Leger El Diablo was again unplaced to La Flèche and Sir Hugo, and he did no better in the Lancashire Plate at Manchester, where La Flèche was the winner. At Newmarket, on the first day of the Houghton meeting, Orme gave 9 lb. to El Diablo, and defeated him easily by three lengths. "He once upon a time beat Orme," writes the Sportsman. This is a flagrant and most anserous case of suppressio veri. The writer does not mention the fact that Orme was giving 16 lb. to El Diablo, the course being A.F., and it was thought that the Duke of Westminster's horse (who had been all to pieces during the greater part of the season) was not up to the mark on the Thursday at Newmarket, and this theory was probably correct, as on Tuesday's running he was obviously certain to defeat El Diablo without an effort.

The negotiation for sending Duke of Westminster to France, to which I referred last week, has broken down, and Mr. Faber's horse remains at Newmarket for the present.

The Duke of Devonshire has sold Cheers for £1,500 to go to Russia. Cheers is a very well-bred horse, being by Persimmon out of Applause II., and he is a good-looking animal, and is quite likely to turn out a success at the stud. He had no pretensions to be regarded as a racer of really high class, but he has nice speed and could stay well. His victory over Rising Glass in the Eclipse Stakes of 1902 was an arrant fluke.

Mr. Buchanan, who was a large purchaser at the Newmarket Sales, has recently bought the beautiful estate of Wool-Lavington, in West Sussex, between Petworth and Goodwood. Wool-Lavington House was the residence of Bishop Samuel Wilberforce, whose wife was the heiress of the Sargent family, and it is their eldest son, Mr. Reginald Wilberforce, who has sold the estate to Mr. Buchanan. Wool-Lavington is situated in a picturesque and diversified district of woods, downs, hills, and heathery commons. I hear that Mr. Buchanan intends to keep his breeding stud there.

A few weeks ago I stated that Mr. Bass intended to send Sceptre to Gallinule. This piece of news was copied next day into the Sportsman, which soon afterwards announced that Mr. Bass had come to no decision on the subject, that Truth's statement was incorrect, and a great deal more contradictory twaddle. I did not trouble myself to notice the Sportsman's sour comments, knowing them to be thoroughly asinine, and founded on audacious and absolute ignorance, as Mr. Bass had made no secret of his wish to patronise Gallinule. That I was justified in this opinion is proved by the following paragraph, which appeared in the Sportsman last week:—

> Mr. Wm. Bass, having failed to obtain a subscription to Gallinule, has decided to mate Sceptre with Cyllene, who stands at Egerton House, Newmarket.

Further comment is needless. In my opinion Mr. Bass is to be congratulated on his failure to obtain a subscription to Gallinule, as Cyllene seems to me to be a much preferable choice for Sceptre. It may be hoped that this mare will not prove a failure at the stud, like so many others which have greatly distinguished themselves on the Turf, notably Jannette, Wheel of Fortune, Memoir, and a score of others, for which a brilliant success was confidently expected. A mare which has been the best animal of her year often produces nothing that can win a selling race, although she is sent year after year to the most fashionable (i.e., expensive) sires, while a despised plater, which has been picked up for a mere trifle, becomes the dam of flyers of the highest class.

The Newmarket Sales dragged direfully, like Pharaoh's chariot in the Red Sea. On Monday only one lot ran into four figures, and this was Lord Harewood's useful horse Almscliff, who was sold to his trainer, George Chaloner, for 1,950 gs., and I am disposed to regard him as being decidedly cheap at that price, if he really changes hands. On Tuesday a lot of terrible trash was offered, and the best price was 600 gs., which Major Roberts gave for Mr. Douglas Baird's three-year-old colt Pomegranate. On Wednesday the stock was of better class (as well it might be), and business was more brisk. Mr. Buchanan certainly got Ravensberg a bargain at 1,200 gs. She is by Bend Or out of Ravensbourne, only three years old, and in foal to Persimmon, the sire's fee being 300 gs. Ravensberg was the only animal in Captain Greville's lot which reached four figures. A very handsome filly foal by Orme out of Flowerdale realised 510 gs., Sir E. Cassel being the purchaser. The sale of this team was the consummation of the dispersal of the Burghley Stud, where Captain Greville succeeded the late Lord Rosslyn. I hear there is a possibility of Lord Exeter presently establishing a small breeding stud in his hereditary paddocks, and hope the report may be correct. Major Loder's best price was 610 gs., which Mr. Weatherby paid for St. Matilda, by St. Simon, in foal to Isinglass. She is eight years old, and would certainly have realised double the money if she had been sold at Newmarket in July. Merry Wife, by Merry Hampton, the dam of Santoi, is thirteen years old, but she was not dear to Mr. Buchanan at 840 gs. if she is in foal to Isinglass. The same purchaser gave 1,300 gs. for Pensée Fugitive (seven years), by Hackler or Enthusiast, in foal to Gallinule. Of the two mares from the Sandringham Stud, the reserve of La Carolina was not reached, and Wheatley, by Orme out of Shotover, in foal to Diamond Jubilee, was a really preposterous bargain to M. Conet at 500 gs. This grandly-bred mare is nine years old, and in foal to Diamond Jubilee, whose fee is 300 gs. I suppose, however, there is some good reason for weeding Wheatley out of the Royal stud, as she cost 1,850 gs. only three years ago, and she may prove a mere whited sepulchre. She goes to France. Mr. Buchanan gave 2,600 gs. for Santry and 2,400 gs. for Vril, and Lord Carnarvon may be congratulated on obtaining these prices for animals which are thoroughly exposed, and are therefore sure to be heavily weighted in handicaps, while they are not good enough for weight-for-age races. On Thursday prices as a rule were miserably low, but the reserves on many lots were exorbitant, considering the circumstances. Mary Seaton, for example, being run up to 2,700 gs., without changing hands. The most remarkable transaction of the week was the sale of Palmy Days at the extravagant price of 3,000 gs. to Mr. Henning. The vendor is to be congratulated. The Melton Constable mares, sold without reserve by the executors of the late Lord Hastings, realised but poor prices, the highest lot being Semitone, by Lowland Chief, covered by Avington, for whom Mr.

Standon gave 620 gs., which appeared her full value, as she is eleven years old. The great bargain from this team was St. Audrey (five years), own sister to St. Patrick's Day, in foal to Avington, and she was really given away at 80 gs. The Duke of Portland's draft realised wretched prices, but they were not remarkably tempting. If the Duke had offered the two-year-olds Ormsby (by Orme out of La Roche) and Cantrae (by Ladas out of Modwena) for sale as yearlings, it is probable that their pedigrees would have run them up to 1,000 gs. each beast, but now the pair realised only the paltry sum of 145 gs. The two-year-old filly by St. Simon out of Garda was cheap to Mr. Dalgleish at 310 gs., if only as a brood mare. The stallion Avington was a great bargain to Captain Hopkins at 120 gs. Alimony, dam of Winkfield's Pride, did not reach her reserve at the auction on Tuesday, but she was afterwards sold privately to Mr. Buchanan for 1,000 gs.

The Sporting Times observes that "for some reason or other we fail to understand, Truth has made a dead set against the Newbury meeting." Truth does not care a potato peeling about the Newbury meeting in particular, but strongly protests against the licensing of any new fixtures whatever, as the official list is already outrageously overcrowded. There is no room for such a fixture, and it is any odds that the simpletons who have been so infatuated as to finance the speculation will lose every penny of their money, in spite of the pertinacious puffing of the sporting papers, many of which would be thrown into their usual ecstasies of enthusiasm (after the customary generous luncheon to "the Press") if a course was projected through an Irish bog or up a Scotch mountain.

It was in November, 1868 (or was it 1867?) that the public Press announced that certain gentlemen of the Thames Rowing Club and one or two other athletic clubs would hold a hare and hounds cross-country run from the King's Head at Roehampton. Some thirty runners turned out. They were dressed in sweaters and flannel trousers and laced boots. Three to four thousand of the public are said to have turned up to see the start of club cross-country racing. The number of spectators may be exaggerated. Veterans' fancies may conjure up large numbers. At all events, there was a crowd which would have gladdened by its numbers the secretary of most modern athletic meetings. They ran over practically the same line of country as that over which the Thames Hare and Hounds now run. Over Putney Heath and Wimbledon Common the Universities of Oxford and Cambridge ran their annual cross-country race last Saturday. It was a miserable afternoon. Although the rain to some extent dispersed the fog there was still plenty of gloom left. The going was very heavy, and the men ran home against a driving rain. Cross-country running is certainly more popular than it used to be at Cambridge a few years ago. The University Athletic Club regards the sport with favour, and this is a good sign. Churchill repeated last year's win, and came home an easy winner by a quarter of a mile in record time. Next to him was Edwards, a freshman, who won the mile and three miles at the Freshmen's sports. He is a little fellow with a big chest and long legs. He is a strong runner, and he should certainly be a long distance runner of no mean merit. Next came Welsh, the Cambridge captain. Well behind were the two Oxford men, Godby and Schutt, a Rhodes scholar. By the way, the "ch" is pronounced hard, like the Greek "chi." After them were two more Light Blues, with three Oxford men well behind them. And so the Dark Blues were badly beaten. Churchill's time was just over half a minute faster than the previous best by Dawson, of Oxford.

The coxswains who steered in the Cambridge University Trials were so heavy that I venture to call the attention of the C.U.B.C. authorities to the fact that Pearson, who ran for Cambridge, only scales 1 lb. over 8 st. when stripped. It does not take a man a very long time to learn to steer. He is an old Westminster boy.

I hear that the London Athletic Club will in all probability secure a new ground, practically on their old site. The purchaser of the old ground also owns the ground on the left. The new track will be partly on the old and partly on the new site. The hundred yards course will be taken as a railway siding. The new ground will also be laid out as a football ground, and there will be up-to-date accommodation both for members and spectators. No doubt every attention will be given to see that the track is suitably laid out. In that event the University sports might well take place there. The track at Queen's, with two sharp corners, makes it about as unsuitable a course for a quarter-mile race as one could find anywhere.

The Green Waves is a Plymouth football club which achieved a temporary notoriety by beating the full strength of Swindon, a Southern League team, in an Association Cup tie. However, the triumph was short-lived, for Gainsborough Trinity, a club well up in the second division of the League, sent its reserves down to Plymouth, and they had little difficulty in beating the local team by three goals to one. Many people wonder that clubs of the class of the Green Waves, and of even lesser merit, should waste their own and other clubs' time by entering for the Association Cup. They have no more chance of winning than they have of flying. One cannot be surprised that professional clubs which are not in the selected few that go straight into the competition proper should complain of the expense that they are put to in meeting such opponents. This is purely the business side of the question, and on business grounds only I can to a certain extent sympathise with those who complain. But it would be a bad day for Association football if a cup which is open to all comers should be closed except to a favoured few professional teams. I have not the slightest doubt that many minor clubs enter because of the rivalry which exists amongst local teams. In fostering such a spirit of competition the cup tie system is excellent. No doubt these ties produce better gates in a small way than mere local competitions. Then there is a chance of a club coming off with an unexpected win, as the Green Waves did. A victory like that adds to a club's reputation and helps to increase the local popularity of the game. The present trend of opinion in the Football Association seems to be that the professional clubs should be left to make their own business terms as to their engagements with players. I have no doubt that councillors who are of this opinion will consider that it is no part of their duty to look at the football cup ties purely from a trade standpoint. They will surely let the competition continue an open one, and leave clubs to rise by the merit of their play to positions in which they will be entitled to escape the expense of meeting the small fry, which have at times a happy knack of proving themselves conquerors.

Woolwich Arsenal had the satisfaction of beating the Cup-holders, Manchester City, in their League match last week by a goal scored in the last ten minutes. If only the Arsenal attack were anything like as good as their defence they would be pretty nearly the best team in the League. Their goal record is a remarkable one. No club in the League has scored so few goals. Bury, which is the last on the list, has scored 23 goals in 15 matches. The Arsenal has only scored 12 times in 14 games. The team has had 12 goals scored against it. The leaders of the League, Newcastle United, alone show a better record in this respect. They have only had 11 goals kicked against them in 15 games.

There is no doubt that the position of the youngster who would like to play Rugby football is a difficult one, if he happens to live in the neighbourhood of the district in which the Northern Union holds sway. For the Rugby Union has ruled that a player may take no part in Rugby football if he has played in a Northern Union match, or if he has signed a form to play for a Northern Union club, even though he may never have played the game. It is surely very hard lines on such young fellows to treat them as though they were outside the pale of amateur players. I cannot see that the exigencies of Rugby football demand such treatment.

The matter is being taken up by Mr. Harnett, and it is to be hoped that he will be successful in his crusade.

In spite of the wretched weather and the inconvenience of the railway journey, some 8,000 people went to Blackheath to see the Heathens play Cardiff. The prospect of a good game with something of an international character in the match proved a sufficient attraction. The Blackheath forwards were unfortunately not at full strength. They were, however, stronger than the Welshmen, and they very nearly pulled the game out of the fire. The Welshmen started scoring in the old way with a punt over the full back's head. At half-time the visitors led by two tries to a goal, and in the second half they were rather lucky to score a goal and a try to a try. Their halves were rather too good for the home team. Considering the state of the ground, the passing on both sides was wonderfully good. But the home three-quarters played too near the scrimmage.

MAMMON.

Stock Markets Less Active—The Slump in Yankees—And the Moral—Position Improving Again—New Year Expectations.

STOCK EXCHANGE business during the week has been on a reduced scale. People outside the "House" have paid less attention to the bargains on offer, and the professional element has been slack, partly because of the imminence of another settlement and partly because the Christmas season is approaching when no man feels inclined to work. The week has, however, not been uneventful; we were treated to a sharp reaction in Americans, which was reflected upon practically every other market in the House. This little excitement bears out what I have said a dozen times or more in "Mammon"—that the influence of Yankees is altogether disproportionate to the actual value of the market to us. The English public takes next to no interest in Americans, having learned wisdom from past (and bitter) experiences, and having more promising ventures to choose from. But all the same, the adverse effect upon the rest of the House was immediate and striking, and the professionals from other markets who are fond of a flutter in Yankees will have considerable differences to meet at this week's settlement. Incidentally, the slump gives point to the warnings which I have given about the dangers of the Yankee market. The set-back was inevitable, failing a rush on the part of the great American public because of the big advance in prices down to the Presidential election. There were no "Bears" left in the market, and much of the "Bull" speculation was carried through on very narrow margins. The moment was favourable, therefore, for a wholesale banging of prices, and whether the loud-tongued gentleman from Boston who precipitated the crash through the incongruous medium of Amalgamated Copper was playing his own game alone, or was acting in conjunction with any of the big Wall Street interests, there is no room to doubt that these latter quickly came in and sold, towards the end that they might come by their own again on a more reasonable basis. Luckily, the shake out of weak "Bulls" was rapid and complete, and as good support was given on the fall, the market strengthened again; and seeing that the fears of another panic were not fulfilled, the rest of the House picked up, and at the time of writing the tone all round is firm once more. Whether much activity will develop during the Christmas account may be doubted, but business in the New Year should be cheerful and profitable.

Money Plentiful and Cheap—Chilian Treasury Bills Repayments—Borrowers Rushing In—The New Russian Loan—Position of the Bank.

Money remains abundant and cheap. Floating credits are large, being increased by the considerable discount business done at the Bank by the recent distributions of dividends, by the repayment of a million and a half of Chilian Treasury Bills, and by the heavy purchase of English Treasury Bills on behalf of the Japanese Government. Call money can be obtained under 2 per cent., and fixtures for a week, which covers the Stock Exchange settlement, are arranged at 2¼ per cent. Discounts are affected by the ease of money, and three months' fine paper is taken by the brokers at 2¾ per cent. Holders of bills are not anxious to part with them, because the outlook seems to indicate a lower level of rates. Lombard Street has convinced itself that the Bank Rate will not be touched, and the year-end scramble for cash will not, they argue, be very keen, and the stringency will certainly not exceed a week or ten days. With the turn of the year, money threatens to be in superabundant supply, and already the hungry horde of Colonial and other borrowers is preparing to take all the advantage possible of the situation. The one disturbing element is the forthcoming Russian Loan, which will be for £52,000,000, of which £20,000,000 will be offered early in the year in Germany and Holland, and the balance of £32,000,000 in France somewhat later. The steady buying of gold in the open market on German account is no doubt in connection with this loan, and it is possible that some of the French millions employed upon the London market may in due course be transferred to Paris in the same connection. But we can spare this foreign money better than we could a year or two ago, since our own resources are increased again. Incidentally to the season of the year, the strength of the Bank is being reduced. This past week saw a loss of £424,000 in the reserve, though, owing to some decrease in the liabilities, the ratio is rather higher at close upon 46 per cent.

Consols Heavy—The Effects of New Issues and the Yankee Slump—Tone Improving—Other Government Stocks Quiet—New Zealand Loan Success—Natal New Issue—Foreigners Dullish—"War" Stocks—Peruvians Falling.

There has been less animation in the gilt-edged market during the past week, and the tone generally may be described as somewhat heavy, the impending issues of new high-class stocks not being an inspiring influence, while the big slump in American Rails has exercised some adverse effect, though that factor operated only for a comparatively brief period. There no longer seems to be any apprehension on the score of the Bank rate, however, in view of the gold shipments from India, and towards the finish the tone is distinctly better, the Funds making a little headway which serves to neutralise to a slight extent the earlier losses. Nevertheless, they are just a trifle lower on balance, and the majority of the other Government stocks, though they have been for the most part rather quiescent, are likewise a little easier. In the Colonial group the New Zealand issue, to which I referred last week, has been a success, and is quoted at a slight premium. Thinking the moment opportune, Natal, too, has come to Lombard Street for the mere trifle of £2,000,000 in Three and a Half per Cent. Consolidated stock, to be applied for public works generally, as well as for the payment to the Transvaal Government of expenses involved in the annexation of the northern districts of Natal, and the encouragement of the agricultural development of the country. The issue price is fixed at 95 per cent., which makes the yield £3 13s. 8d. per cent., in addition to which there is a modest bonus in the first payment of interest, the last instalment being due on February 22, whereas a full six months' interest is payable on February 1. Foreigners have been rather quiet and dullish, Paris being a seller when the American slump seemed at its worst. Movements generally have been within narrow limits, Argentine and Brazilians being at about the same level on balance, while Spanish, Turkish, and Egyptian Unified, after reacting rather sharply, turned on the upgrade towards the finish. In regard to the "war" stocks, Russians maintain their position as a result of the usual inspired support, notwithstanding that the new loan for £52,000,000 will probably make its appearance early in the year. Despite the annihilation of the remnants of the Russian Port Arthur fleet and the evidently satisfactory progress of the siege operations, Japanese do not exhibit a particularly buoyant tendency, and as a rule are slightly lower. Finding that there is but little left to "go for," operators in Peruvian Corporation issues are disposed to allow the stocks to slip back, but the losses are not very appreciable.

HOME RAILS STEADY—GOOD TRAFFICS AND TRADE RETURNS—SOME INVESTMENT SELECTIONS—DIVIDEND PROSPECTS—RUMOURED METROPOLITAN ISSUE.

Considering the unsettlement wrought by the recent break in American Rails, the course of the Home Railway market during the last few days has not been unsatisfactory. The possibility of trouble arising out of the Yankee slump, coupled with the usual desire on the part of some people to clear up speculative commitments in view of the approaching end of the year, was responsible for rather more selling than fresh buying, but prices have held their own as well as in any market throughout the House, and, seeing that we are within a month of the dividend period—when coincidently monetary conditions should be tending towards greater ease—I am still of opinion that a revival of Home Rails is not far off. The past week has furnished two points that are well worth bearing in mind by the speculative investor. In the first place, the traffic returns, for the first time for many weeks, made an almost uniformly good showing. Even the Great Northern managed to break the long spell of decreases, and with several of the Companies it was a case of traffic increases coming on top of increases in the corresponding week of 1903 This will be seen from my traffic table, which follows:—

In the second place, the Board of Trade returns for November made an almost sensationally fine exhibit. Our foreign trade for the period increased by £3,000,000, equal to over 13 per cent. One-half of this improvement was contributed by the cotton and woollen industries, and such a decided revival in textiles affords ample justification for my predictions of a few months ago, made with the object of directing attention to the possibilities of the Heavy stocks. The attractions which this group presents to the speculative investor are still good. Traffics to date have, it is true, not been all they might have been, but only in the case of the North-Western and Midland are the decreases at all large, and in both these instances under-publication has no doubt been as usual indulged in to an extent that will materially reduce the actual declines in gross revenue. Even should a slight reduction in dividends be necessary, it will probably be found to have been already discounted, for a yield of nearly 4 per cent.—which is the return obtainable on the best Home Railway Ordinary stocks, taking the last two half-years' dividends as a basis—is sufficiently generous, even allowing for the higher rates of interest current upon investment stocks during the last year or so. Speaking individually, Great Western seem to me the pick of the Heavies on dividend prospects, although, looking a little farther ahead, there is plenty of scope for a rise in Brums, in view of the revival in the textile trade, and the likelihood of a spread of that revival to other industries. Great Northern Deferred has hitherto been kept back by disappointing traffics, but there is still a good prospect of the dividend being increased by ½ per cent, owing to the wiping out of the permanent way suspension account a year ago. This would make the dividend on York Deferred 1½ per cent. for the year as against 1 per cent. for the previous twelvemonth Regarding Great Central stocks, it is interesting to notice how tightly those who have lately been buying cling to their holdings. There is no doubt that the steady manner in which the revenue of this line is expanding justifies a great deal of the faith that is being placed in the ability of the junior stocks to return to the dividend stage. The Preferred and Deferred must, I am afraid, be classed for many years to come as nothing more than gambling counters; but as lock-away purchases for dividends in the less remote future a good deal might be said for the several Preferences ranking ahead. The Preferences of 1876 and 1879, which are now receiving their full 5 per cent., are cheap as investments, seeing that they both yield nearly 4 per cent., with a growing margin behind them. In the Southern group Brighton "A" is receiving attention in the hope of an increased dividend, a careful calculation pointing to the payment of 5½ on the stock for the year, as against 4½ per cent. for 1903. A rise in this stock could, however, be predicted with more confidence were it not for the large capital issue known to be impending. The South-Eastern and Chatham joint lines have done well during the current half-year, but while a larger sum should be available in net revenue, it is unlikely that dividends will in either case be increased. On the present basis, however, a purchase of South-Eastern "B" strikes me as attractive. This stock is now receiving 5 per cent., and at the existing price the yield is 3¾ per cent., while the interest will be increased to 6 per cent. as soon as earnings permit. Dover "A" and Little Chathams must still be left to the speculator pure and simple, for dividend possibilities are too remote to be worth discussing. Perhaps the arrangements to be made next year in the direction of a complete amalgamation of the South-Eastern and Chatham systems—including a fusion of capital—will give the "Bulls" of Doras and Little Chats their opportunity. Regarding the Underground stocks, there has lately been a fair amount of selling of Metropolitan Ordinary on the belief that Debentures for half a million will be issued in the New Year. This issue, added to the 1¼ million of capital stock raised since last March, would involve an increase of £60,000 in interest charges, arising out of the work of electrification, and evidently some people regard it as wise to transfer from the Ordinary into the new Convertible Preference. This latter at present yields £3 6s. 6d. per cent., and a holder possesses a perpetual option to exchange into the Ordinary, stock for stock. The week's movements are shown below:—

Violent Yankee Fluctuations—Bad Break in Prices—A Demonstration of Market Top-heaviness—Fall Arrested, but Public Confidence Badly Shaken—A Sagging Market Predicted.

The American market has had its full share of excitement during the past week. For the first time since its inauguration last spring, the "Bull" enthusiasm per meating this department has received a decisive check, and although the semi-panic that seized the market at one time has been dispelled for the time being by the prompt support given by powerful interests, its effects upon the public mind will not so easily be wiped out. It has been a bad week for the "Bull" forced to close by the running off of too slender a margin, but a still worse one for the big financial houses on the other side of the Atlantic, who had been patiently biding the time when they could make a renewed attempt to lighten their long-held and heavy burden of undigested as well as indigestible securities, and who had just commenced to achieve that object. For weeks past I have tried to impress upon my readers the dangerous extent to which the "Bull" movement in Yankees had been allowed to develop, and recent events may serve to give emphasis to these warnings. Much has been said during the last few days as to the probable cause or causes of the fall in American shares; we have heard of the bold and startling attack delivered by Mr. T. W. Lawson, of Amalgamated Copper fame, of renewed attempts by a New York clique to smash the Gates party, and of a drive by the Standard Oil interests with the object of affecting public sentiment against President Roosevelt's proposals for the regulation of railroad rates—proposals which it is said do not find favour with the leading railroad magnates. There is no doubt that it was Mr. Lawson's sensational "Bear" campaign, conducted as it was by violently worded four-column advertisements in all the principal American papers and by the widespread circulation of alarmist telegrams, that precipitated the break, and it may be that the other two reasons given had also some foundation of fact, but to get at the primary cause of last week's flurry we must come back to the simple admission that the market was top-heavy. I have no wish to quarrel with those who contend that general conditions in the United States have of late shown improvement in many important directions. It is beyond question that the iron and steel industry has begun to reawaken—the fact is seen in steadily advancing prices for the raw products and in the expanding earnings of the United States Steel Corporation. Then again the Southern States, according to Government estimates, are to enjoy a record cotton crop, which should, from a national point of view, do much to off-set this year's indifferent wheat harvest. There is nothing to find fault with in railroad earnings, for, taking as an instance the month of October, sixty railroads showed a net increase in receipts of nearly 10 per cent. Meanwhile money remains comparatively cheap, and although New York has been called upon to send several millions in gold to Europe it has been able, thanks to the beginning of the usual winter reflux of currency from the interior, to avoid anything like stringency. Over and above the satisfactory conditions of money and trade there was nothing in the Presidential message to Congress delivered the other day to which the leading vested interests could take serious exception. There had been just the chance that Mr. Roosevelt would startle the Trusts by a threat of legislative action upon the tariff question, but the fear has proved baseless, and those who have waxed fat upon the maintenance of a high tariff wall may possess their souls in peace. It is, however, beside the real issue to dwell too much upon considerations such as these. To the unbiassed spectator the improvement in market conditions to date seemed to have been amply discounted some time ago, and of late Wall Street appears to have renewed its old attempt to discount the millennium. A comparison of prices on the week, disregarding intermediate fluctuations, does not disclose anything like an adequate restoration of the price level to the normal. Declines of from $3 to $5 are not very severe if the rise that preceded the fall extended to $20 or $30. For the time being, as I hinted above, the "Bull" leaders have succeeded by energetic buying to contest the fall; but the stocks they acquired will have to be distributed sooner or later, and the shock that has been administered to the public has materially damaged the chances of such distribution being effected at anything like existing quotations. In many quarters it is believed that the rally seen at the end of last week will be followed by a long period of dwindling prices. This may or may not be, but it looks as if the back of the "Bull" movement had been broken, and the public on this side, at any rate, will be more disposed than ever to give Yankee shares a wide berth. To a large number of the leading Railroad bonds, of course, the objections that apply to the junior issues do not extend. In the Bond group there are plenty of securities that can be bought to return from 3½ to 4 per cent., and may be regarded as quite suitable for the investor who wishes as high a yield as is compatible with practical safety. My usual table is appended:—

Canadian Railways—The Influence of Yankees—Grand Trunks — Argentine Railways and the Labour Troubles—Mexican Railways.

Although earnings are remarkably good, Canadian Pacific shares show a considerable decline on the week. The situation has not changed for the worse—if anything the latest traffic makes it better—but the shares possess a very close affinity with Americans, and the setback is attributable to the weakness of that market. People who hold the shares as an investment have no reason for worry. The shake-out in Yankees was a foregone conclusion so long as the American people showed no disposition to take over the burden of the professionals who had been hoisting prices—very successfully, too—down to the date of the Presidential election, and the inherent situation being healthy—as regards Canadian Pacifics, at least—a recovery is certain to take place. It may be days or it may be weeks before this happens, but happen it will (failing some altogether unexpected contingency) in due course, and in the meantime holders of "Canadas" are assured of their dividend. In the matter of Grand Trunks, the position shows virtually no change. Values were put lower on the slump in Americans, out of sympathy, but of real sales there were none worth speaking about, and as the few adventurous "Bears" will have to buy back, and as the immediate as well as the more remote prospects are encouraging, there ought to be an early recovery in prices. Thirds and the Ordinary are worth buying on any appreciable decline, provided the purchaser is in a position to hold into the new year, when—given a moderate sort of winter—earnings will be contrasting with the big decreases of the earlier months of the current year. It is not contended that the junior Trunk stocks are strikingly attractive investments on the basis of yield—they give no yield, in fact, in a direct sense; but they are very promising speculative counters, regarded as a short-term holding, and they are an excellent lock-up. For investment the First Preference stock is all right, and while there is some slight doubt as to the payment of the full 5 per cent. for the year on the Second Preference stock, the Company ought, as I pointed out last week, to save enough to meet this charge. The future of the Grand Trunk Company is promising, and those who buy its junior stocks to hold for developments can scarcely do badly. My table of Colonial and foreign railway stocks is appended:—

In the Argentine Railway market dealings have been on a poor scale. The labour troubles are reflected in decreases of £7,838 in the earnings of the Great Southern and £5,538 of the Buenos Ayres Western. The first company has suffered by the interruption of business in the Buenos Ayres Produce Market, and the second has had, in addition, to contend with a strike of freight handlers at two of its stations. The threatened general strike in Argentina appears to have fizzled out with ignominy, and as the new wheat is now beginning to move the outlook is fairly satisfactory. At the same time, the situation is somewhat uncertain, and while the course of values promises to be upwards, or, at the least, to be maintained, I see little prospect of a really active market this side of the New Year. Argentine Railway stocks have had such a big advance during the course of the past few months that there does not seem to be room for much further appreciation. Mexican Railway stocks have moved with a good deal of freedom, and show improvements on balance, it being now tolerably certain that the threatened rate war will be averted.

Kaffirs Easier with Americans—Dealings Less Active—Influence of Christmas—Inherent Conditions Sound—November Gold Output—Labour Position—More Stamps Dropping—Eastern Rand Shares—Mr. Robinson's Chastened Optimism—Jagers Splitting Scheme—Deep Level Developments.

The bad break in Americans had an adverse effect upon the South African market, but it was only temporary. The immediate affinity between the two is not close, but both are of the speculative order, and the Kaffir dealers usually have a small line open in Americans as well, and when a break occurs in the latter it is frequently necessary to get rid of South Africans to make good the losses in the other market. So far as actual merits and real influences go, the condition of the Yankee market counts for nothing in relation to mines on the Rand, but the two move very much in sympathy all the same, for the reason stated. But there was no particular pressure to sell Kaffirs, even when Americans looked at their worst, and the recovery since has been substantial. Dealings have not been on a large scale, however; the public interest is not keen; another settlement has been imminent, and as Christmas approaches there is generally a slackening of transactions. The undertone of the market keeps strong enough, because the condition of the mining industry is improving, because there is not much stock about, because holders are not keen about selling, but are more bent upon holding for higher values, and because the big houses are working more in concert. The tendency of prices is decidedly upwards, and as the outlook is good, I see no reason why a further recovery should not be witnessed soon, if not (to a striking extent, at all events) during the course of the Christmas account, at the latest after the turn of the year, when all promises to be plain sailing, apart from a few riots, which do not count for much. The mining industry, now that a sufficiency of labour is guaranteed, is going ahead; more stamps are being dropped; and, what is the ultimate measure of prosperity, the production of gold is going up steadily. For November the total was 336,167 oz. of fine gold, of the value of £1,427,947, an increase of 10,542 oz. in weight and of £44,780 in value as compared with October. The result is the more satisfactory since the preceding month had one day more, and that day, I calculate, was equivalent to about 11,000 oz. There is no quarrelling, therefore, with the progress that is being made. We are still some way short of the record of August, 1899, but, considering all things, the process of recuperation is satisfactory, and it is because of this and of the possibilities of further expansion that Kaffirs appeal to me as a promising market, the more especially as prices are still at a very moderate level—as gauged by sheer merits, and without regard to the speculative element which impels men to toy with mining shares of the promising sort, whether they be high or low. As the Financial News puts it, "What has brought about the recent strong demand for the leading counters and shares in Companies belonging to the important groups is the certainty that in the future big increases in the outputs month after month will result from the plentiful supply of unskilled labour which is being rapidly accumulated." This is the great point to be kept in mind. Meantime, more and more Companies are producing. The Witwatersrand Deep, at which mine 1,500 coolies arrived at the end of September, has commenced crushing with sixty stamps. The Robinson Central Deep is dropping 20 additional stamps borrowed from the Crown Deep, which is at present using only 145 out of its complement of 200 stamps. A number of other Companies are ready to start when the labourers arrive, and, as usual on a good market, favourable developments are being reported. It is announced that the Village Deep, whose west shaft had been sunk several hundred feet before the war, has now struck the reef at about 2,350 ft. On the Aurora West the Main Reef leader has been intersected in the east incline shaft, and shows satisfactory assays. The May Consolidated is cheering its shareholders with a dividend of 20 per cent., which compares with 17½ per cent. at the corresponding date of last year. East Rand Mining Estates are well maintained, and so also are Geduld, African Farms, Apex, and Cloverfields. Some realisations caused a slight set-back in Van Dyks, but these have hardened again, and Rand Collieries have continued in quiet request. There has been buying also of British Transvaal Mines on the statements made at the meeting. Welgedachts have been strong as a result of the cable stating that the coal seam 54 ft. wide, to which I referred last week, is of good quality. The Randfontein Group has kept almost where it was, Mr. Robinson's speech at the Robinson Bank meeting being pitched in a tone of somewhat chastened optimism. Barnato descriptions are among the promising things of the market; an official announcement is made that the partnership with Mr. Carl Hanau is dissolved by effluxion of time, and that that gentleman takes over the firm's holding in the Coronation Syndicate, and that his Barnato interests are taken over by the firm. In the Diamond group the feature has been the strength of Jagersfonteins on long-expected splitting proposals. After the general meeting at Kimberley on January 7, a resolution will be submitted for the purposes of sub-dividing the existing 200,000 shares of £5 each fully paid-up into 500,000 Preference shares of £1 each fully paid-up, and 500,000 Deferred shares of £1 each fully paid-up. The Preference shares will be entitled to a fixed cumulative Preferential dividend at the rate of 25 per cent. per annum, and to rank as regards capital to the extent of £5 per share in priority to the Deferred shares. Subject to the rights of the holders of the Preference shares, as mentioned above, the whole of the profits of the Company will be divisible among the holders of the Deferred shares. Premier Diamonds have risen to 60, and De Beers have been rather favoured by Paris. Vaal Rivers are well maintained. My table shows the movements on the week:—

* £5 shares.

While I look for an upward movement, it is not to be expected that the whole market will participate to an equal extent. Generally speaking, the best proportionate advances will be scored by the moderate-priced shares, and in particular I should recommend Barneys and Johnnies, General Mining and Finance, Rand Collieries, Goerz, Randfonteins, and Hendersons. The recent arrivals, such as Van Dyks, Brakpans, and New South Rands, are likely to be supported by the "shops" until public interest of an unmistakable kind is developed in them, and therefore they are worth buying, especially on a market which looks good. H.E. Props. always make a good gamble, and before long New Reef Developments, recently brought out under the same auspices, will probably be taken in hand. The African and European Investment issue, introduced last week by Messrs. Lewis and Marks, has been an unqualified success. Attention has been paid, especially by Paris, to Deep Level shares, in view of the developments referred to above. My table shows the net movements on the week:—

It may be pointed out that in the above table the figures in parentheses indicate the total number of stamps erected and the number at present working. The report of the Barnato Consolidated Mines for the year to October states that the Company has acquired the freehold rights of a portion of the farm Cyferfontein No. 128, situate in the district of Heidelberg, in extent 794 morgen 418 square roods, for the sum of £4,000. At the annual meeting the chairman said:—"With unskilled labour, with the confidence of investors which a sufficiency of both classes of labour will establish, all the capital called for will be plentifully forthcoming, and the valuable assets of such Companies as the Barnato Consolidated Mines will all become productive, and, though there seems to be some opinion that Mining Companies do not concern themselves much about the welfare of the Colony, I am sure that the most severe of our critics cannot be of opinion that we should regret to see the country benefited so materially as it must be by the coming rapid increase in the progress of the gold mining industry." The report of the Johannesburg Consolidated Investment Company has also come to hand. The year's profit amounted to £219,015, and with £394,480 brought in, the sum available is £613,495. The dividend of 10 per cent. will absorb £270,989, so that a balance of £342,505 remains to be carried forward. The total of the Company's investments in real estate in South Africa is £538,000. At the meeting of the Robinson South African Banking Company, the chairman dealt at some length with the general position and prospects in South Africa, and he referred particularly to the Randfontein group of mines. The Randfontein, a very large property, has been most seriously handicapped on account of the scarcity of labour. The directors at Johannesburg have not been in a position to do justice to this large area of ground—the mines that are working there at the present moment, and the mines that are to be worked. Mr. Robinson added:—"For instance, we have already, as you know, twelve Companies formed. Out of the twelve subsidiaries three are now working. There is South Randfontein, Robinson-Randfontein, and North Randfontein, which has just started. North Randfontein, I may tell you, has got about 1,900 Chinese. That was the first importation of Chinese. The next mine that is going to work is Porges. We are making now a very great effort to get natives to start that mine. It is ready, and the additional machinery has been erected. There are 100 stamps ready, and all the surface works are also ready. The mine has been developed, and the only thing we want is labour, and, as I have told you, we are really beginning to hope that we shall be able to get sufficient natives to work the Porges Mine. With regard to South Randfontein the position is now gradually getting better. We have had great difficulties there. I have told you that throughout the whole winter it was a terrible struggle to get sufficient boys to keep the mill going. That applies also to Robinson-Randfontein; but now the increased supply of natives will facilitate matters, and I believe our position will become very much better."

Rhodesians Quieter and Dullish—Another Discovery—Chartered Easier—The Smaller Shares and Reconstruction Gossip—Willoughby Denial—Mining and Finance and Clark's Consol.—Banket Descriptions Dull—Northern Group Easier—Zambesia Report.

What might be described as an epidemic of gold discoveries is raging in Rhodesia, for in addition to the wonderful banket reef recently unearthed and the equally potential alluvial area stumbled across quite accidentally by a lonesome prospector within the past two or three weeks, the Administrator of Southern Rhodesia is in the happy position to announce another surprise in the shape of an auriferous banket "exactly similar to the Black Reef, Johannesburg," existing in the vicinity of Victoria. A rather tired market, however, swallowed this with indifference, and it exercised practically no effect, perhaps because it is recognised that there are Black Reefs and black reefs; but it will be interesting to have the further particulars which will no doubt be sent along in due course. At present operators are waiting with commendable patience for the result of the investigations into the alluvial deposits, and it is to be hoped that, pending the arrival of this information, the Chartered Company will see fit not to increase the tension by announcing any further "strikes" which would lead one to the conclusion that Rhodesia is something more than a common or garden variety of El Dorado. As a fact, Rhodesians have been quieter, and rather more subdued than of late, the effect of the dulness prevalent in the "House" generally being reflected in the somewhat weaker tendency exhibited. Chartered, however, continue active, and after fluctuating within narrow limits, show a slight loss on the week. In regard to the smaller descriptions the persistent gossip hinting at recontruction schemes as an outcome of the better prospects promised by the alluvial discovery has been quite sufficient to bring about lower values, though the Directors of the Willoughby refute these rumours, saying that the financial position of the Company "does not necessitate such a step." One of the schemes so far announced is that having as its object the fusion of the Rhodesian Mining and Finance, with Clark's Consolidated, which has resulted in the calling together of a number of disappointed shareholders for Wednesday next at the Great Eastern Hotel, E.C., to discuss the methods to be adopted to oppose any such scheme. The issued capital of the Rhodesian Mining Company is £242,033, and that of the other Company £269,210. The new concern is to be registered with a capital of £300,000, divided into 300,000 shares of £1 each. Clark's shareholders will be entitled to an allotment of 134,605 shares of £1 each, 14s. paid (being in the ratio of one new share for every two shares now held), and holders of Rhodesian Minings to an allotment of 145,220 shares of £1 each, 14s. paid (being in the ratio of three new shares for every five shares now held). A total of 279,825 shares will thus be absorbed, and the assessment of 6s. per share, provided the whole of the shares are taken up, will realise a sum of £83,947, which will pay directors' fees and salaries for quite a considerable period. Though displaying a somewhat more cheerful disposition towards the close, the banket descriptions have on the whole been distinctly depressed, more especially the New Banket shares, in which a considerable amount of profit-taking resulted from the approach of the special settlement. In the Northern group there has been an absence of any violent fluctuations, the tone being, in fact, decidedly dullish, Tanganyikas sagging away persistently. Zambesias have not been helped by the report, which cannot be described as a very informing document. Many properties which did not show any promise were abandoned on the recommendation of the engineers, while, as soon as apportunity occurs, arrangements have been made to work some of the others on tribute. Both Northern Coppers and Rhodesia Coppers have moved on the downgrade almost throughout, but Rhodesia Broken Hills shares, the latter Company's recently-floated subsidiary keep steady. My usual table of movements is appended:—

WEST AFRICANS TOLERABLY FIRM—BETTER GOLD RETURNS—ASHANTI GOLDFIELDS' REPORT—MISCELLANEOUS MINES—COPPER SHARES—CHAMPION REEF—EGYPTIANS.

Quite a fair amount of animation has been noticeable in the Jungle throughout the week, but with the dulness which developed in other departments towards the close it is not surprising to find that most of the earlier gains are more than neutralisd. In fact, the majority of the leading descriptions are slightly lower on balance, but despite this the tone generally appears to be just a trifle better, thanks chiefly to the persistent efforts of the professionals, who are doing their utmost to tempt the outsiders, though so far without much success. On the whole the gold returns for November are somewhat better, the Wassau's 2,392 oz. being an increase of 225 oz., while the Ashanti Sansu's total is 200 oz. higher, and the Ashanti Goldfields has increased its aggregate by about 30 oz. at 4,530 oz., in spite of a much reduced tonnage treated, an office note explaining the low grade by the fact that only 44 per cent. of the gold contents could be extracted owing to the cyaniding plant not working. The dullest spot in the whole market has been Ashanti Goldfields, the report being rather unsatisfactory. Nothing is said about any new issue of debentures, concerning which rumour has been busy recently, but the accounts seem to indicate that it will not be long before the Company is compelled to ask for more money. In the first place, the amounts paid in dividends in the first half of the last financial year exceeded the profits earned throughout the twelve months, and there remains a debit balance to go forward. The record of operations is not particularly inspiring, it being obvious that more attention has been paid to gold production in the richer portion of the mine rather than to the proper development of the property. To sum up the position, I may be permitted to make use of Mr. Daw's own report, brought up to the beginning of November, in which he states that "in all the mines development work has been neglected. No sinking has been done at any of the mines (excepting the pioneer shaft lately started at Cote d'Or), whereby the mines can be opened in depth, while several other important points have received but little attention. We are making arrangements to resume this important work, and shall not hesitate to push it vigorously, so as to increase our ore reserves." My usual table of prices is appended:—

The feature of the Miscellaneous Mining section has been the slump in Copper shares arising out of a semi-panic in New York, which led to heavy realisations of Tintos, etc., on account of Paris. The shares are now above the worst. In the Indian group the general tendency is tolerably satisfactory, though at one time Champion Reefs suffered slightly from dissatisfaction over the report. Perhaps the most significant feature of this document is the statement of ore reserves, which have been increased by only 53,858 tons as compared with 121,037 tons during the previous year. Otherwise there is little to cavil at, though the total distribution is 5 per cent. less than for the previous twelve months at 160 per cent., owing to the full participation of the new shares created. Profit-taking has resulted in a slight setback in Egyptian shares, but the tendency still remains buoyant, and Nile Valleys should soon go ahead once more. Among New Zealanders, Waihi Grand Junctions are still creeping upwards, some further support being induced by the cable that good ore has been encountered in one of the winzes sunk in the No. 2 level. Mount Lyells relapsed rather sharply as a result of Colonial sales, which were evidently induced by the subsequent cable pointing out that at the 600 ft. level the driving continues in barren ground.

Westralians Neglected and Featureless—Tendency Dullish—Fingalls Easier—Kalgurli Results—Associated Firmer—"Little Kangaroos" in the Background.

Very little interest continues to be manifested towards Westralians, either on the part of the professionals or the outside public, and as a consequence marked idleness prevails throughout the whole department. The tendency, too, is not very brilliant, the majority of the shares being inclined to sag away slightly in the absence of any support, while of features there have been practically none. Fingalls relapsed rather sharply at one time, as a result of the somewhat unsatisfactory return for last month, attributable to a great extent to trouble with some part of the machinery, while there has been persistent selling of Perseverance. Kalgurlis, too, participated in the general downward movement, despite the satisfactory report showing a net profit of £82,541, as compared with £67,451. The ore treated aggregated 54,056 tons, yielding 49,524 standard oz., or an average of 18.40 dwts., which is slightly lower than during the previous period, when 44,261 oz. were recovered from 45,127 tons, an average of 19.6 dwts., but it must be remembered that the working costs have been appreciably lessened, the expenses per ton being only 27s. 3d., as against 32s. 1d. It is hoped that by March next the enlarged plant will be able to cope with about 3,100 additional tons a month, and it is encouraging to note that the cost of this new machinery will be paid for out of the surplus profits. A rather encouraging cable from the property induced some support for Associated, as well as for Central and West Boulder and Boulder No. 1, but otherwise the section has been devoid of interest. The "Little Kangaroos" remain neglected in the background, while there has been less attention paid to the Deep Leads. My usual table of movements follows:—

London and Paris Exchange.

After a suspension of about a week, the London and Paris Exchange has opened its doors again, and is presumably carrying on the old business in the old style. The Managing Director sent out an official statement of the origin of the difficulties, but I confess that to me the explanation is unconvincing. The fact is, however, that whether for good or only temporarily, disaster has been averted, and an issue of Five per Cent. debentures to the amount of £500,000 is being made, and will be redeemable in three years at 10 per cent. premium. I should like to know what are the assets securing these debentures, but on this matter Mr. A. M. Mandeville is not particularly communicative. The offer of debentures is made in order "that the Company may have ample working capital to carry on its business, which is undoubtedly a progressive one and to enable it to exercise certain options which it holds, and to develop its business." The trust deed, it is stated, will constitute a floating charge "upon all the assets and undertaking of the Company, including its uncalled capital"—the amount of which last, if any, it would be interesting to know. The debentures are not offered to the general public as a business proposition, but only to clients and friends who have faith in the concern. In connection with the London and Paris Exchange, I have received a number of letters for which I have no room, owing to the heavy calls upon my space; but, without dealing further with the concern, it will be sufficient if I say that the debentures might well be left to the friends and clients, including the Press representatives, who have been so kind.

New Issue.

The following prospectus has been published:—

Westralian Estates and Timber Company.—Capital. £110,000, of which £60,000 is in Seven per Cent. Cumulative Preference shares and £50,000 in Ordinary shares. There are now offered 30,000 Preference shares and Six per Cent. First Debentures to the amount of £25,000. The Company has been formed to acquire and develop two freehold estates in Western Australia.

"Truth" Toy Fund.

Once again it is my pleasure to ask those readers of Truth who have benefited by the perusal of "Mammon" to send me contributions for the annual Toy Fund, an institution which gives great pleasure to thousands of children at the Christmas season. Business has shown a distinct improvement during the latter part of the year, but the Fund has not so far received the same support as in 1903. I am sure, however, that I have only to bring this fact to the attention of my readers for the defect to be remedied promptly and handsomely. I have already received the following contributions, for which I offer my best thanks:—H. Halford and Co., £1 1s.; D. B., £1 1s.

"Truth" Letter Box.

Correspondents will oblige by observing the following rules:—

Name and address, which must accompany all inquiries, should be written on the communication; cards are apt to be lost or misplaced, causing unnecessary trouble.

Anonymous letters will not in any case be attended to.

I cannot reply to inquiries by letter or telegram.

A nom-de-plume or initials (the former preferably) should be given if it is desired that the real name shall not appear in the paper.

Inquiries should be put as briefly as possible, plainly written, and numbered.

Communications received after Friday may not be replied to in the following issue. Delay may also occur where an exceptionally long list of securities is submitted.

I do not recommend brokers.

Government Securities.

Careful.—Five per cent. cannot be obtained with absolute security comparable to that of the Funds, but reasonably safe securities can be secured. Chinese Fives, Japanese Sixes (first issue), Mexican Fives, Chilians (1885), Argentine Four and a Half per Cent. External, and Egyptian State Domain bonds will give an average of rather more than 5 per cent. Derby Castle.—In time, Consols will no doubt get near to par, but there are several factors operating against an early return to that figure. They are good for a greater advance than the Irish Land stock or Transvaal Threes, because they possess a sentimental value which the others lack, and because they have suffered badly through the war expenditure and the enormous accumulation of gilt-edged securities entailed thereby. Mex.—The Cuban Five per Cent. Bonds make a reasonably good purchase. The Japanese Sixes are also very satisfactory on the basis of the yield, coupled with the security of the Customs upon which they are a direct and first charge. Chingford.—I should hold on to the New South Wales and Victoria stocks for the present, since the interest is assured, and there should be some recovery when conditions allow the gilt-edged market to go ahead unchecked. At the same time, I do not think I should buy more. The Colonies—for sins which are only too well known—are not in favour just now.

Railways.

Boulter.—I suggest Great Central Five per Cent. Preference stock of 1872 and Brighton Preferred Ordinary stock, which will give you over 3¾ per cent. The other investments are good. E. H. F.—You should hold on to the Egyptian Delta Light Railways Preference shares, as the Company is likely to go on advancing. The arrears should be paid gradually. Behind the Preference shares are £10 Deferred shares to the amount of £110,000. The Preference have a priority as to capital, and rank before the Deferred for cumulative dividends of 5½ per cent. per annum. After payment of this, the profits are to be employed towards a cumulative sinking fund of 10s. 9d. per cent. per annum to replace the capital in seventy years, and the surplus then remaining is to be divided—one-half amongst the Preference, and one-half amongst the Deferred. The Preference should go higher. Seafarer.—There is next to no doubt that the Grand Trunk Second Preference stock will receive its full 5 per cent. for the past year. Tulip.—I should prefer Home Railways to Industrials, and among Home Railways I should choose North Westerns, Great Westerns, Brighton "A," Great Northern Deferred, and North British.

MINES.

Navi.—In the circumstances you had no right to put your money into anything so speculative as mines, but hold on to Heriots and Jubilees for more active conditions in the Kaffir market, which condition should come early in the new year at the latest. Operative.—Sons of Gwalia ought to be kept, and the Oroyas are a good holding for dividends, and some ultimate appreciation. Cavendish.—E.R. Mining Estates, Nile Valleys, Welgedachts, Rand Collieries, and H.E. Props. make a good selection, but take them up and get out when you see a moderate profit. Rhodesia Coppers should have a big rise ultimately—when, for instance, there is an early prospect of the full exploitation of its resources. P. R. T.—Nile Valleys are a promising speculation if you get in on any fall. Martha.—I fear you would only be throwing good money after bad by joining the amalgamation. Armour.—A very poor lot, but 1, 2, and 3 might be kept on the chance of some improvement on a good Kaffir market. A. B. C., Sale.—Charter Trusts, Oceanas, and Transvaal Developments ought to be held for an advance. The other share is unpromising. Afric.—Banket shares will, no doubt, go ahead again after their rest. You might safely hold Simmer and Jack for 3. Hythe.—The Pretoria District Diamond Company is distinct from the Pretoria Proprietary Diamonds, Limited. It owns the western portion of 871 morgen of the farm Elandsfontein, near to the Premier Diamond Company, which has done so remarkably well. There is not much market in the shares in this country. Kismet.—You might hold for 15s. Strathcona. Johannesburg Consolidated would suit you nicely. Thos. Johnson.—I do not recommend a purchase of Stratton's Independence shares. Ignoramus.—Egypt and Soudan Mining and Nile Valleys are likely to go ahead in the near future. I am told that the United African Exploration has sold its holding of Nile Valleys, but nothing official has been announced. Box.—Brilliant and St. George are anything but a bad gamble, but, judging from the Colonial selling, it seems probable that recent developments have not been altogether satisfactory. Zeta.—The note merely had reference to the quotation of the shares, which it has been decided to eliminate because the dealings in them are reduced to next to nothing. Cymro.—Niekirks would suit you. Broomassie.—It would be best to sell the Cosmopolitans. The West Africans I do not care for. Bibianis are more hopeful. Patricia.—1. Try Barneys or Rand Collieries. 2. I do not look for an early rise in S.A. Territories. 3. The thing is quite unattractive. Strandtown, Belfast.—Matabele Reefs might be bought for a moderate rise in the price. The other I do not recommend. I should prefer Balkis Lands. Hagen.—1. Vogelstruis Deep might be bought if you can afford to hold. 2. I have been unable to obtain a quotation. 3. Klerksdorp Gold and Diamonds are quoted at about 2s. 6d. They are unattractive. Retsyl.—Charter Trusts are worth taking up. I do not recommend Salisbury Buildings. Midlands.—The Directors will do nothing beyond take their fees so long as the concern possesses cash resources. When these are exhausted, they will no doubt reconstruct. The price of the shares, about 3s., suggests that this step is not very remote. The shareholders, I suppose, are incapable of amalgamating for their own protection. A. B. C., Edgbaston.—A number of adverse rumours were circulated about the Jubilee, but a cable has been received from Johannesburg stating that the position is quite satisfactory, and a dividend of 5s. per share has been declared. H. P.—I do not recommend dealings with C. Eastwood and Co., of 81, Gracechurch-street, E.C., or any other outside broker in Kaffirs or anything else. Country Saw Bones.—The South Africans are all of the good sort, and worth keeping for higher prices. The Egyptians should be good for a further rise. Islam.—No reliable information is available regarding the life of the mine. There is much development work yet to do. New Yorker.—The shares are likely to go to your buying prices early in the new year. Spero.—The issue of the report has not altered my opinion. Wathen.—Keep Jubilees, New Primrose, and Estate Finance and Minings. The others are not attractive. Anon.—The Rand Roodepoort is still in existence, but I do not regard it as a hopeful venture, and you might get out if a buyer can be found. The Directors are stated, in Mahson's "Mines of the Transvaal" to be Messrs. N. Tronoon (Chairman), W. H. D. Tyler, and C. W. Atkins. Barton.—Barbertons are worth holding. Shansis are also a hopeful purchase on any setback. As the others give you a profit take it, and place the proceeds as you suggest in Robinson Rands. Red Hand.—1. Egyptian Mines Explorations have much promise. The Company is interested in a very large area on which several series of gold-bearing reefs have been discovered. One property, the Um Rus, has been formed into a separate Company. The capital is £250,000. 2. I do not know the American mines, which is not dealt in on our market. Plumbago.—I am unable to trace the concern. Possibly the Agent-General for Canada in London would be able to help you. Prince.—The shares are a moderately good speculation. Bann.—Waterfall Estates stand at 2s. The prospects are not encouraging.

MISCELLANEOUS.

Constant Reader, Hoylake.—I cannot recommend it, and would advise you to leave it alone. Jag.—TRUTH had occasion to refer to the National Old Age Pension Trust some time ago, and came to the conclusion that it is actuarially unsound. Igd-i-Gul.—The address of the Prudential is Holborn Bars, London. Sceptical.—I believe the concern to be quite sound and reliable. Regular Writer.—I would not recommend a purchase of the shares mentioned. With the turn of the year there may possibly be a revival in Industrials, but these are not among the attractive things of the market. Query.—They are legal points upon which I regret I cannot enlighten you. North.—Better send the query to the secretary of the insurance Company. Taylor, Lancaster.—This is just a sample of the many evils arising out of dealings with "smart" American Companies. The best thing to do is to continue the payments on the same basis, in the hope of eventually getting a decent return. Cymro.—It is a new concern which is to be conducted conscientiously, and I think you do not run much risk in depositing money therein. Walker Legge.—I would not recommend any dealings with the institution. Gwynne.—Many thanks for your communication dealing with Stephens and Henderson, which is very interesting. I hope to take up this matter shortly. F. R.—I am obliged for the Isle of Thanet tram ticket advertising Howard, Marshall, and Co. Perhaps if the attention of the management was drawn to the true nature of the business they would exercise a little more caution in the future. Mancunian.—I think you might hold on to the textiles a little longer in the hope of the Companies benefiting by the better conditions prevailing. Inquisitive, Peckham.—Of course, nothing definite is known, but the general impression is that as the trade of the Port, as indicated in the quarterly returns, has been good, the Deferred stock of the London and India Docks Company will receive the full 4 per cent., in which case the yield at the present price is about 5 per cent. Stones.—My thanks for your kindness. I am repeatedly warning readers of TRUTH against Stephens and Henderson and their risky cotton-future gambling. Alviso.—I believe the concern is still in existence somewhere, but I cannot trace it now. Iris.—To some extent the fall is traceable to the depression prevailing in the brewery division. You will probably remember that just prior to the last dividend a lot of selling took place, though the distribution proved to be all right. I do not know of any cause for alarm. Constant Reader.—Of their class they are quite a good holding, but I should not be disposed to buy more at the current price. Doubtful, Huddersfield.—Leave the London and New York Exchange severely alone and it will be to your great advantage. Timor.—South Metropolitan Gas is worth keeping as an investment, and I should not advise a sale. Jackson, Burnley.—Do not join the reconstruction. You are entitled to your share of the assets. Camden.—I do not think you could do much better. They will probably advance within a few months. Ignoramus, Walsall.—Currie and Crisp seem to be an offshoot of another bucket-shop. Leave them alone. Sell, Surrey.—I would not advise a purchase of Barrett's Brewing and Bottling shares. You can do infinitely letter. T. R.—Of their class Bovrils make a tolerably fair holding. I have a poor opinion of Gramophones. Try J. Lyons.

MIXED INVESTMENTS.

West.—1. North Metropolitan Tramway debentures are a good investment security, but whether they are suitable for your case depends upon the terms of the trust. They are redeemable in 1909, and at the present quotation would bring in about £5 16s per cent. Interest is payable half-yearly in January and July. 2. I should prefer the Chinese Five per Cent. Loan. 3. Johnnies are well worth holding for a rise. 4. National Telephone Four per Cent. new debentures make a good investment. Athenæum.—1. Mysores and Champion Reefs are good mining investments. 2. I should keep the Uruguays for a higher price. The country is in a peaceful state again. Yarrow.—1. Better sell the Missouris. 2. The new Anglo-French Exploration Preference shares ought to be taken up. St. Kilda.—Cotton and Wool Dyers shares will probably go better. I am not very hopeful about the other. My thanks for the enclosures. A. Z., ed.—1. I look for higher prices in the Home Railway market within the next month or two, and Brighton "A," Coras, and British are not likely to be left behind. 2. Grand Trunk Ordinary should also go better in the new year, when the earnings will be comparing with very poor figures for the early part of the current year. 3. Of the mines I should choose Egyptian Mines, Chartereds, and Lomagundas. Of Kaffir Consols and Salisbury Buildings I do not think highly. Mexico.—All the railway stocks are good to hold. Chilian Four and a Half per Cent. and Japanese Sixes (May issue) give cause for no anxiety, and the New South Wales and Queensland shares might be kept for dividends and some recovery, along with other gilt-edged stocks. Most of the Industrials are safe, but Beyer Peacock Preference shares are not up to the same standard as the others, and as to St. Ermyns and the Mansions Proprietary I am not in a position to say much, though interest is paid regularly, and that is a good point. Teaman.—1. Now that the freight outlook is improving, the prospects of India General Navigation shares are brighter, but I should not buy any more. Try the Preference, which will give 6 per cent. 2. Consolidated Tea and Land First Preference shares might be bought as a speculation. The other tea shares are fairly promising, especially Nuwara Eliya. 3. The charges on the Orange Diamonds were all right. H. Belfort.—The mining share might be held for better conditions, but with more competition ahead, you would do well to sell the various cycle shares. Speculator.—If the Orange Diamonds give you a fair profit, take it. Lace Diamonds might be held for a better profit. Boksburgs ought to go to 2. Sewing Cotton Ordinary is promising now that the cotton trade is likely to have a run of prosperity.

INDUSTRIALS QUIETER—TONE DULLISH—A FEW BRIGHT SPOTS—TRUSTS STILL IMPROVING—TELEGRAPHS FIRM—TEXTILES HELPED BY THE CROP REPORT—BREWERIES DEPRESSED—GAS STOCKS—MEAT SHARES DOWN AGAIN—ARGENTINE LAND RESULTS—HUDSON BAYS IMPROVE—CHINA SHARES EASIER.

Dealings in the Miscellaneous market have been rather less active, and the dulness which pervaded the House generally almost throughout the week seems to have spread to this department as well, though it must not be imagined that there have not been one or two bright spots. Trust stocks, for instance, remain quite buoyant, and as the supply does not seem to be equal to the demand the tendency have been upwards still, further improvements having been registered by Foreign and Colonial Trust, General and Commercial, London, Scottish and American, Alliance, Guardian, amongst many others. The Iron and Steel group, too, contrives to present a fairly cheerful appearance, Pease and Partners, Pearson and Knowles, South Durhams, and one or two other shares making a little progress, while Armament descriptions remain tolerably firm, more especially Vickers Maxims and Armstrongs. Apart from Anglo-American Deferred, which have moved somewhat erratically, the Telegraph division remains firm, Easterns, Westerns, Globe Trusts, and Cuba Submarines coming in for a fair amount of attention, while investors have been picking up Telephone stocks, all of which show slight appreciations. On the strength of the American cotton crop report, further support has been forthcoming for textiles, more especially for Calico Printers, though with but little effect upon the price of the shares. Coats have improved, and Fine Spinners are steadier, while Bleachers and British Cotton and Wool Dyers are more buoyant. Dulness pervades the Brewery section, City of London descriptions remaining a particularly weak spot, the Ordinary losing four or five points, while Allsopps have turned on the downgrade again. In the American group also the tone is easier, Milwaukee and Chicago, City of Chicago, and St. Louis issues receding, and Bieckerts are dull. Quite a considerable investment demand has sprung up for lighting shares, Continental Union and Commercials more particularly, while South Metropolitan and Gas Light and Coke are not neglected, and for the benefit of those of my readers who are on the look-out for good stocks of this sort, I append the following table:—

	Price.	Yield per Cent.
Bournemouth 10 per cent. A (£10)	29½	£4 11 6
Brighton and Hove Stock	220	4 13 6
British Gas (£20)	41	4 18 9
European Gas (£10)	20½	5 10 0
Gas Light and Coke Stock	98	4 9 6
Imperial Continental Stock	207	4 16 6
San Paulo (£10)	12¼	5 14 0
South Metropolitan Stock	130	4 3 0

Apart from Royal Mails, which are still offered, the Shipping group continues more cheerful, P. and O. Deferred and Preferred advancing further on the strength of the recent satisfactory showing, and Leyland issues have recovered further. Among "bunshops," Aerated Bread, after slumping further, contrived to pick up again, but Lyons remain dull, and in the Meat class a somewhat less hopeful feeling is discernible, Nelsons declining steadily. My remarks made some time ago that the prosperity of Argentina would certainly be reflected in the increased earnings of many of the Land Companies operating in the country, are by no means falsified by the showings of the Santa Fé and the Argentine Southern Land Companies, both of which tell of more satisactory receipts. In the case of the former, the net profits amounted to £28,300, as against £24,000, and a dividend of 3½ per cent., or 1½ per cent. more than a year ago, is recommended, while the receipts from the timber business would have been far greater had not the Company been handicapped by the lack of transportation facilities. The net results of the Argentine Southern Land Company is £8,100 better than a year ago at £14,700, but the dividend is at the same rate 4 per cent., the amount carried forward being £4,000 greater. Nitrates continue fairly active and buoyant, but Traction shares are disposed to be dullish, London United Trams and Road Cars both declining. After a period of profit-taking, during which the shares lost a good deal of ground, Hudson's Bays have turned smartly on the upgrade, and optimists are not wanting to express the opinion that within the next week or so they will establish another record in the matter of price. Realisations on home as well as Continental account have also materially affected Chinese shares, Pekin Syndicates, Shansis, and Yangstse Valleys moving downwards almost consistently. The unsatisfactory nature of the report is reflected in the lower level of Ilford shares.

QUEER STORY.

SOCIAL CAMPAIGNERS.

MR. AND MRS. ALFRED WILLWAY kept up, during the season, a well-appointed establishment in Mayfair, and also entertained frequent week-end parties at their country villa, the Rowans, near Maidenhead.

Willway was a rich man of palpably plebeian extraction, who was understood to have made his fortune by speculating largely in Egyptian bonds at the time of the Arabi Pasha insurrection. At any rate, he had made it, which was the main consideration. And, in due course, he bought the house in Mayfair and began his social campaign, with the able assistance of his young and extremely pretty wife.

It was to the latter almost entirely that he owed whatever success he achieved in this campaign; for—truth to tell—Willway himself, despite his wealth and the lavishness of his entertainments, was but ill-qualified to shine in society. A common-looking man, of coarse manners, very florid in his dress, with an undue predilection for fancy waistcoats and diamond rings and scarf pins, given to boasting of his money, and generally addicted to vulgar ostentation, he was regarded by the denizens of the sacred pale as an objectionable outsider. (You must bear in mind, of course, that this was twenty years ago, when such qualities, so far from being positive credentials, as they are nowadays, were—strange as it may seem—actually drawbacks.)

But Mrs. Willway was the antithesis of her husband. In the first place, she was twenty years his junior. In the next, she was beautiful, ladylike, refined, vivacious, and witty. Whether in looks, manner, or conversation, she was alike charming. All men who met her were captivated by her; and before long the spell of her fascinations had fallen upon a certain distinguished nobleman, who occupied a prominent position in her Majesty's Government.

Not, mind you, that there was anything scandalous about it. Nobody suggested that—even at the clubs. The noble lord was a staid family man, whose solid domestic virtues were a standing guarantee of his perfect respectability. But he was susceptible, in a strictly decorous way, to the charms, both facial and conversational, of pretty and witty women; so that he soon became one of the most persistent admirers of Mrs. Willway, who combined both the prettiness and the wittiness in an unusual degree.

From this many social advantages accrued to the fascinating little lady. Men who might otherwise have held aloof from her receptions came and paid her homage from interested motives. They knew the value of being on good terms with a pretty woman who had the ear of a leading Cabinet Minister. A word from her, in season, might do for them in the way of rapid promotion what all their mere "d——d merit" (to use Lord Melbourne's historic phrase) would never achieve. The noble lord, indeed, was not a conscious jobber. He was even conscientious—as Cabinet Ministers go. All the same, when at least fifty men were equally qualified, or (as was more probable) disqualified, for a vacant post, it was only natural that the name suggested by the dame whom he most wished to please should be the name that was eventually gazetted.

The menfolk, then, courted Mrs. Willway for their own sakes; and by-and-by the women began to be civil to her for their menfolks' sakes. They called upon her. They came to her parties, and, when they were there, they enjoyed them. Mrs. Willway was an admirable hostess. She knew how to make things pleasant for her guests, and she had Willway's cheque-book behind her to enable her to turn her knowledge to the best practical account.

Thus, within twelve months of the opening of their campaign the Willways were more or less securely established in society, and had the entrée of all houses except a few of the very exclusive.

Among those who were most frequently to be met at their Mayfair mansion was young Reggie Bowdale, of the Treasury. Bowdale was a handsome, gentlemanly young fellow, who made no secret of his admiration for pretty Mrs. Willway. He quickly became one of her favourites; and when, after a while, he got his step, sooner than in the ordinary course might have been expected, everybody said that Ethel Willway had worked the oracle for him.

He himself was of the same opinion. He thanked her for her good offices in grateful terms.

She tapped his arm with her fan, in a playful gesture, and smiled at him kindly.

"Foolish boy," she said. "What makes you think that I had anything to do with it? Are you not aware" (with a comically demure look) "that in this country everything goes by merit, and that it is always the best man who gets the berth."

"Don't seem to me that the best man has anything to do with it," answered Reggie, laughing. "It's the man who has the best woman behind him—as I've had, in this case."

And he fixed his large boyish eyes upon her in a glance of ardent gratitude and admiration.

"So you persist in ascribing your promotion to me?" she said, toying with her fan and looking down at the carpet.

"Yes; because I know it was you. It was. Wasn't it?" he demanded, eagerly.

"I will not deny that I put in a good word for you with Lord X.," she answered. "But, then, my influence in that quarter is very slight, after all."

"Slight?" he exclaimed. "Why, they all say that you can turn Lord X. round your little finger, and I'm sure I believe it. Indeed, it is impossible to conceive how any man of mere flesh and blood could refuse you anything."

He spoke fervently, with a strong emphasis on the second personal pronoun. His eyes were fastened hungrily upon her beautiful face, as it were devouring it.

"Do you know I am quite jealous of Lord X.?" he went on.

"Jealous?" cried she, with an air of mild surprise. "Jealous? What should make you jealous of him, you foolish boy?"

"Because I am half afraid that you care for him more than you do for me," he replied, bending forward and fixing his eyes on hers in eager questioning.

"What? May I not be friends with you both?" she inquired, with tantalising evasion.

"Friends!" he ejaculated, scornfully. "Friends!"

"Eh? Do you not wish to be friends with me, then?" was her provoking rejoinder.

"You know—you must have seen!" he cried, in fierce, eager tones, now losing his self-restraint and casting discretion to the winds, "that I can no longer content myself with being your friend—that—oh, Ethel! You know that I love you!"

"Oh! Hush!" she exclaimed, very shocked and distressed. "You must not say these things to me. I—I—am not free to listen to them. It is not right."

"I cannot help it," he answered, wildly. "There are limits to a fellow's self-restraint. I can keep silence no longer! Oh! Ethel—Ethel—say that you—you—care for me a little!"

"Oh! oh! What would my husband say if he knew it?" she sobbed, covering her face with her hands.

"I do not believe that your husband loves you half as much as I do," he declared, passionately.

"That is the hardest ——. I mean, leave me, Reggie—leave me, I entreat you!"

He did not leave her. On the contrary, he bent forward, and clasping either little wrist in his strong grasp, drew her hands from her face and looked searchingly into her eyes.

"You do love me! You do! You cannot deny it!" he cried, triumphantly.

She made no attempt to deny it. She only continued imploring him to leave her.

"Nothing but misery and unhappiness could come of it," she said.

"Nay! How can we be unhappy if we both love one another?" he cried, in ardent tones.

She gently freed her wrists from his detaining hands and, rising from her chair, stood confronting him. Her face was very pale. Traces of tears still glistened in her dark eyes, but she had recovered command of herself.

"Reggie," she said, firmly, though her voice trembled a little. "For your sake, as much as for mine, you must never speak to me like this again. We must both forget what has just passed between us as though it had never been. We have stood, this afternoon, you and I, perilously near the brink of madness and ruin; but, thank Heaven! the realisation of danger has come in time for us to draw back. Leave me now, Reggie—in the name of my self-respect and of your own, I adjure you. And when we next meet, let it be on the footing of friends and comrades—dear, dear friends, if you will—but only friends, for we can never be anything more."

Her words, her look, her tone were well calculated to appeal to what was best in the young man's impulsive nature. He took her hand and raised it, reverently, to his lips.

"You are right," he answered in a husky voice. "I was mad to say what I did. Tell me you forgive me, and I will go."

"There is nothing to forgive," she answered, deprecatingly. "I have been as much to blame as you. Let us shake hands, Reggie. And you will be my friend, will you not?"

"Till death," answered the lad, fervently. "If you are in any difficulty, any trouble, any danger, in which I can assist you, you have only to lift your finger to me, and I will come. You will not forget, Ethel, will you?" he demanded, earnestly.

His eyes were full of tears.

"No, Reggie, I will not forget. And, now, good-bye!"

He took her little hand, pressed it to his lips once more, then he turned and was gone.

It was a week or two later, when Reggie Bowdale, coming down to breakfast one morning, found a little heap of letters lying on his plate.

He took the top one and opened it. Evidently a bill. "To account rendered. . . . . The favour of your cheque will oblige."

He tossed it carelessly aside, and took up the next. "Mrs. Laneton-Lorkie at home," etc., etc.

He stuck this up in the chimney-glass.

Then he opened the next: "If at any time you should require an immediate advance of cash——"

WHITEHALL COURT, S.W. FLATS FURNISHED OR UNFURNISHED Overlooking Thames and Gardens. High Class catering with moderate tariff. Domestic service provided.

"Bah!" he said. "How these touting usurers do pester a fellow with their confounded circulars."

And he threw it, impatiently, on one side. Then he took up the next letter. It was enclosed in a small, delicately-scented envelope and addressed in a handwriting the sight of which brought the colour to his cheeks and the flutters to his heart. He tore it open with eager fingers.

700, Curzon Street, W.,
April 11, 18—.

Dear Reggie,—I am in trouble and urgently need a friend's assistance. Will you come to me? I shall be alone this morning from 10 to 12.—Yours most sincerely, Ethel Willways.

The young man read this note through several times, while his eyes sparkled and his pulses throbbed. Ethel was in trouble, and she had sent for him. He kissed the note passionately more than once; then placed it in his breast pocket.

At ten minutes to ten he left his rooms. By ten o'clock he was standing on the Willways' doorstep.

"Mrs. Willway at home?" he inquired of the solemn butler who answered the bell.

"Yes, sir. Will you walk this way, sir?" and he was ushered into the cosy morning-room where Ethel Willway sat.

She rose to greet him, with heightened colour, holding out both hands.

"This is good of you, Reggie. But I knew you would come. I am really in an awful difficulty. Sit down, and let me tell you all about it."

He sat down, and listened to her sympathetically, as she confided her trouble to him.

"It is about money," she said. "I suppose everybody thinks that I have as much as I possibly want. But this is not the case. My husband makes me a most inadequate allowance, considering all that he expects me to do; and if I ask him for more (this is between you and me, Reggie) he always puts himself in a terrible passion. It is a miserable state of affairs. I assure you that I often do not know where to turn for a shilling, and I subject myself to all sorts of inconveniences and humiliations rather than ask Mr. Willway. But now a climax has come. I am heavily in debt to my dressmaker, who is pressing me for payment. A horrid man came and served me with a writ yesterday. I went round to see the woman at once, and begged for time; but she says that unless she has £500 by noon to-morrow she shall proceed with her action. But if she gets her £500 she will wait for the balance. I was so desperate that I didn't know what to do. I simply dared not tell my husband, and that is why I wrote to you. Reggie, dear friend, can you, will you, lend me £500?" she cried, in imploring tones.

"By Jove, if I'd got it, you should have it like a shot, Ethel," he answered, warmly. "But, unhappily, at the moment I've hardly £20 to my name."

"But can't you get it for me somehow?" she persisted, with desperate entreaty, fixing her tearful eyes anxiously upon his face. "Wouldn't some of your friends lend you the money? I wouldn't ask you, dear fellow, if it wasn't really urgent. If my husband gets to know of the debt" (she covered her face with her hands and began to sob) "I—I—tremble to think of the consequences. Last time he had to pay a bill for me (and it was a much smaller one than this) he struck me—yes! struck me!" she cried, her bosom heaving. "I have told no one else. I would tell no one but you. I bear the marks of his violence now. See!"

And she drew back the loose sleeve of her morning gown, revealing a livid bruise upon her white arm between the shoulder and the elbow.

"The brute!" ejaculated Reggie, starting up, with clenched fists. "He ought to be thrashed within an inch of his life."

"He deserves it. But unfortunately I am in his power. Besides, he is not always like that. Generally he treats me well enough. It is only when I ask him for money. Then he gets beside himself. I really think he hardly knows what he is doing. But I cannot face another such scene with him—Reggie, I can't. Oh, help me, Reggie! Save me!" she cried, breaking down again and sobbing in wild abandonment.

Reggie scratched his head and looked very much distressed and perplexed.

"Don't cry, dear," he said. "I'll see what I can do. I'll try to get the money somehow. It will mean going to the Jews, I fancy. But I'd rather do that than fail you in your hour of need."

"Oh, thank you, Reggie. You are good," she murmured, gratefully.

"I have not got you the money yet," he answered, smiling. "But if I can get it by hook or by crook, I'll bring it round to you in good time to-morrow morning."

As he walked back to his lodgings, he turned over in his mind the names of all his friends who might have either the inclination or the ability to lend him £500. He could not think of one.

"It will have to be the Jews," he said, with a sigh, as he let himself in with his latch-key.

His breakfast things had been cleared away, but the servant had left his letters, as he had thrown them down, still lying on the table.

The open circular of the moneylender caught his eye at once. He picked it up and glanced over it.

"I suppose this fellow is as good, or bad, as any other," he mused. "They are all much of a muchness. Let me see. What's his name? James Johnson, 500, Sackville-street. Well, I'll go at once and look the worthy Johnson up."

He acted on this resolve. He saw Mr. Johnson, a bland and plausible gentleman, with an unmistakably Israelitish nose, who, though very pleased to do business, made some demur about lending so large a sum as £500 without a second name. However, after looking Reggie up in the Directory, and ascertaining that he had an assured income of £500, he agreed to waive the condition and to lend him the money on his own promissory note.

So Reggie got his £500, and left behind him his autograph upon stamped paper, undertaking to pay James Johnson the sum of £600, three months after date, for value received.

He took the cash round to Ethel Willway at ten o'clock next morning, and gave it into her own hands.

He was aware that he had done what men of the world would call a very foolish thing. But Ethel's unfeigned and rapturous gratitude was, for the moment, an all-sufficient compensation.

However, when the three months had expired and he found himself in the position of having to take up his promissory note for £600, and only about £50 to do it with, he began to realise more fully the hobble in which his impulsive generosity had landed him.

He went to see James Johnson and asked for time. Johnson, who was considerably less bland than he had been on the occasion of his former visit, scouted the suggestion. Mr. Bowdale might renew for another three months by paying £100 for interest. But unless that amount were paid within twenty-four hours—the days of grace having already expired—he should sue for the recovery of his £600, without further notice.

Reggie, naturally in a great state of anxiety, went off to see if he could raise the extra £50 he needed among his friends.

The first one he applied to was Tom Jenkinson, a pal of his in the Foreign Office. He told Jenkinson the whole story of his trouble, so far as was consistent with keeping Ethel Willway's secret, and ended by asking him to lend him £50.

Jenkinson's answer astonished him.

"Awfully sorry, old man," he said. "But I'm in Queer Street myself. And—oddly enough—my hobble is the very same as yours. I mean I've gone and borrowed money from an infernal Jew, a rascal named Johnson, of Sackville-street——"

"Johnson, of Sackville-street!" ejaculated Reggie, in great surprise. "Why that's my man!"

"Eh?" cried Jenkinson, surprised in his turn. "Well, this is a rum go, I must confess. And what Paris.—Mercedes Hotel, Place de l'Etoile. Most modern hotel in Paris. Opened April, 1904. Situated in healthiest and most select quarter. Luxuriously furnished.

makes it still more rum is that Dick Fullerton, of the W.O.—you know him?—to whom I applied only yesterday for a loan of a few pounds, tells me that he, too, is stony broke owing to his being in Johnson's clutches."

"By Jove! But this is devilish odd," cried Reggie, in great amazement. "I say, Jenkinson, you don't mind my asking," he added, quickly, "but what the deuce did you want to go borrowing money from a usurer for?"

Jenkinson coloured and looked embarrassed.

"I did it to help a friend," he answered, a trifle stiffly.

"A lady friend?" demanded Reggie, with a startled, almost a frightened, expression in his boyish eyes.

"I must decline to answer you. It is my private affair," replied Jenkinson, with huffy dignity.

"It makes no difference," said Reggie; while something like a cold hand seemed to grasp and freeze his very heart. "I know your friend's name already, Jenkinson; unless I am very much mistaken."

"You do? Who is it?"

"Ethel Willway!"

* * * * *

It ended in their consulting a capable solicitor, by whose inquiries the following facts were conclusively established:—

Alfred Willway, alias James Johnson, operating through his wife and decoy, Ethel, had long been reaping a rich harvest among the young men of their acquaintance, particularly those in Government offices. But the masterpiece of the whole scheme was that, while ostensibly lending money in large sums, he had not, in effect, lent a halfpenny; since the whole of each so-called advance had gone straight back, viâ his wife, into his own pocket.

It remains to add that, upon the pricking of the bubble, Alfred and Ethel Willway promptly disappeared from the scene of their social and pecuniary successes. And it was only a mistaken sense of chivalry on the part of Ethel's victims (upon which, in event of exposure, that astute little woman had doubtless calculated) that saved them from the criminal prosecution they so richly deserved.

MUSIC.

THE WAY TO NATIONAL OPERA.

THE recent success of the San Carlo Company at Covent Garden has naturally set people talking of national opera again, and among others Dr. Cowen has been confiding his views on the subject to the Daily Express. Rightly enough, he deprecates what he calls "any wonderful and ambitious scheme for a national English opera-house," suggesting instead that a beginning should be made in a less pretentious fashion:—

> The proper way to begin is undoubtedly to start a small but thoroughly representative concern, on the lines, broadly speaking, of the Paris Opéra Comique. The repertory, to begin with, might consist of such works as "The Marriage of Figaro," and some of the best of Auber. The "books" should be newly translated, and the production mounted with all the care for effect and brightness that is lavished on so-called musical comedy. It should be called, for purposes of identification, the English Light Opera House, and, of course, the opera should be varied each night.

It is manifest that a scheme of this kind would involve infinitely less risk and outlay than any attempt to establish full-fledged grand opera right away. More, there is warrant for the hope that the near future will actually witness an attempt on the very lines indicated, or something closely resembling them. Some months ago, at any rate, it was definitely stated that Mr. George Edwardes was meditating a project of this very nature, and recent information goes to indicate that it has not by any means been abandoned. At this very moment, indeed, Mr. Edwardes is running a work, in M. Messager's "Véronique," which almost answers to the type which Dr. Cowen refers to. Then, before this, he was responsible for "The Duchess of Dantzic," still running in the provinces, which, whether it did or did not repay in London the heavy cost which it entailed, enjoyed beyond question great popularity. Mr. Leoni's "Ib and Little Christina" was yet another production of the same order whose success, when given experimentally under the same management not long ago, was equally significant; while two other works which Mr. Edwardes has commissioned, one to be composed by M. Messager and the other by Dr. Hugo Felix (with M. Sardou as his librettist), are, it is said, already on the stocks.

It is, indeed, quite impossible to doubt that if such a light opera enterprise as that which Dr. Cowen suggests were set on foot by the right people it would enjoy the hearty support of the public. But it would, of course, be an essential condition of success that the thing should be done in absolutely first-class style. That is one reason why Mr. George Edwardes would tackle the enterprise with such exceptional likelihood of success, since no one appreciates more fully the wisdom of the open-handed policy. It cannot be repeated too often in this connection that London audiences will never tolerate second-rate performances. Again and again the failure to recognise this fact has wrecked attempts at the provision of cheap opera in London in the past. The performances offered have almost invariably been second-rate. Those recently witnessed at Covent Garden, on the other hand, were nothing of the kind, and the public responded immediately. Let Mr. George Edwardes mount legitimate light opera as tastefully and sumptuously as he has mounted "The Orchid" and "The Cingalee," and the public will patronise it just as readily as it flocks to pieces of the latter type. This is by no means to imply that pretty dresses and bright scenery are more important than the music, but obviously when offering the public something new which has yet to establish itself in popular favour it is beyond all things essential that it should not be presented in a dingy or univiting fashion.

Obviously, too, the utmost circumspection would be called for in regard to the choice of works. Here, again, it would be essential to bear in mind that a more or less non-opera-going public was being appealed to, and to select the works presented accordingly. Then, light opera once fairly established, the advance to "grand" opera would be a natural step—not in the sense that the same theatre and organisation would do for both undertakings, but in the sense that, as Dr. Cowen suggests, the educational influence of the lighter works would prepare the way for those of a more serious order. It is pleasant to note, too, that the same common-sense view of the matter is taken by Sir Charles Stanford, who has been so prominently identified before now with proposals of a more ambitious kind:—"As an Opéra Comique will if carried out on really artistic lines create a taste which will ask for more, and as its inception involves less expenditure than grand opera, it ought to be an easy matter to found it." In which connection it is hardly needful to say that Stanford's own delightful "Shamus O'Brien" ought to be one of the earliest works from native pens to find a place in the répertoire of any such house as that proposed. Then, in due course, other new works from pens both native and foreign, would certainly be forthcoming, and with the thing once fairly floated and established as a going concern, a step forward would have been accomplished for the like of which we might wait till the crack of doom if proceeding on the old impracticable lines of founding right away a full-blown national opera with the aid of subventions from the public purse.

Mr. Richard Peyton's gift of £10,000 for the endowment of a chair of music at Birmingham University is a very munificent act, which loses nothing of its interest for musicians in general from the fact that the first occupant of the post is to be Sir Edward Elgar. Certainly no better choice could have been made, and the appointment has all the more to commend it, perhaps, from the circumstance that the composer of "The Apostles" has owed so little himself to academic influences. It is true that he is entitled to write himself Mus.D.Cantab., but that degree was conferred, of course, honoris causâ, and in general Sir Edward Elgar certainly has little in common with the average musical academic, who has so often been the subject of more or less well-merited gibes and jeers. There is obvious appropriateness, too, in the selection of Sir Edward in view of the fact, not only that some of his most important works have been produced in Birmingham, but that he has his residence in the Midlands, and altogether it will not be surprising if many are induced to pursue their musical studies at Birmingham by reason of his presence at the head of affairs. Perhaps in time, indeed, a Birmingham School may result which will do as much for British music as the Glasgow School has done in extending the fame of British painting. It will at any rate be highly interesting to note the lines on which Sir Edward Elgar sets to work, and one and all will certainly wish him every success.

There is indeed only one fear. It would be infinitely regrettable if the acceptance of this position meant any serious absorption of the time and energy at Sir Edward's disposal for creative work. It is one of the most unfortunate circumstances in connection with music in this country that so many of our best composers are perforce compelled to devote the greater part of their lives to the duties of academic and kindred posts—in default of living on their means or on nothing at all. Sir Edward Elgar, however, after a hard struggle at the outset of his career, has since been mercifully free from any such entanglement, and the result has been forthcoming in the works which he has produced. It is sincerely to be hoped, therefore, that this happy state of things may not be seriously modified by any academic or other non-creative work which he may be induced to undertake. Sir Edward must not go giving to Birmingham what is meant for mankind.

Dr. Richard Strauss, who is to appear at the Queen's Hall in conjunction with the Queen's Hall Orchestra on Monday next, when the programme will include his symphonic poem, "Tod und Verklärung," must emphatically be regarded as the champion hustler among modern musicians. Clearly the cloistered life has small charms for one who keeps himself so constantly in the public eye. In the course of three weeks, recently, he is said to have conducted at one place and another no less than fifteen concerts. At the same time he has his duties as chief conductor of the Royal Opera at Berlin to attend to, besides finding time now and again, it may be supposed, to compose. There are those who criticise Strauss severely for dissipating his energies to such an extent in this way, for the sake, as it must be supposed, of the large fees which he obtains. The principle of art for art's sake, indeed, finds no friend in Strauss, who is one of the few living composers making a really big income out of serious music. But there is of course another side to the question. After all, the labourer is worthy of his hire, and if Dr. Strauss places a proper valuation upon himself and his work, who shall blame him for doing this? The bigger composers have been content too long to give to the world the fruits of their genius without adequate reward. In Strauss's case his notion is said to be to amass a sufficient sum to enable him to retire in comfort and thenceforward to devote himself without a care in the world to the unfettered cultivation of his art. Meanwhile his enemies accuse him of adopting a policy of deliberate sensationalism expressly to spread his name and fame and hasten the happy advent of his release. Yet it is certain that Strauss could obtain far greater popularity for his works if he chose to write music more agreeable to the average ear—and, be it added, more readily played by the average orchestra. Besides appearing at Queen's Hall, Dr. Strauss will be entertained at a soirée to be given by the Concert-goers' Club at the Prince's Galleries on Sunday evening.

The announcement that Dr. Joachim is engaged in the preparation of a new School of Violin, to be published in three volumes, is interesting. It has been said of Dr. Joachim, indeed, that he is not a great teacher, and many will recall the stir created some years ago by the assertions under this head of one of his most famous pupils, who roundly declared that the great master had cramped his individuality and taught him nothing. But this, even if true, which many other pupils took leave to doubt, would not affect, of course, the value of such a treatise from his pen as that referred to, which may, indeed, be expected to rank among the most important productions of its kind. Professor Andreas Moser, one of his former pupils, who was responsible also for a Life of him published a few years ago, is to assist Dr. Joachim, it is understood, in the preparation of the work, which will be published next January by Messrs. Simrock in Berlin, and in this country by A. Lengnick. It is a famous artistic lineage which Joachim boasts, the line of descent running right back from himself through Böhm, Rode, Viotti, Pugnani, and Somis to Corelli and Vivaldi. Sarasate is another of to-day's great violinists through whom the traditions of the Turin school are preserved in a manner not less remarkable—he having been taught by Alard, who was a pupil of Habeneck, who studied with Baillot, who learnt of Viotti.

From a well-known teacher of singing I have received the following on the subject of British v. Continental vocal training:—

> I am with Mr. Visetti that on principle there is no necessity for English students of singing to go to "foreign parts," in order to acquire pure and distinct enunciation in various languages. For there have been and are still boats plying across the Channel, which have brought, and can still bring, "efficient" teachers to England. The root of the evil is, that so many incompetent singers overcrowd the concert platform and operatic stage, and that in England—with the exception of a comparatively small number—every singer teaches, and every teacher sings, so that most of them divide their time, attention, and bodily strength (which one pursuit alone would take up entirely) between the two. Abroad the state of affairs is very different. The teaching of singing, and singing in public, are mostly two distinct professions. If this distinction were practised in England, a very different result in the training of singers would be obtained. In England, even "students" undertake both, viz., singing and teaching, and very often, singers and even instrumentalists, who are a failure as public performers, take to teaching singing as a faute de mieux, and simply to make a living somehow. How can these incompetent teachers impart to their pupils all that is necessary to make a good singer? How can they teach a branch of the art of music which wants such manifold knowledge? And, besides, how is it possible that a singer can train a pupil systematically when he or she is on tour, singing, and the student is left for weeks without tuition? There is nothing more important than the regular "supervision" of the student by the teacher. In England students think it is a great deal, if they have two lessons per week of half an hour's duration, abroad they have to take certainly three, and often more, lessons per week, besides having other instruction belonging to the art of singing.

All of which goes rather to bear out the opinion which I ventured to express that British vocal teaching too often leaves a good deal to be desired.

An event of no ordinary interest was the recital given on Saturday by M. Maurel. The famous artist is getting on in years now, and if it is impossible to forget this when he sings, the perfection of his method and the rare distinction of his style still impart wonderful fascination to his art, so that the recital as a whole was quite uncommonly enjoyable. Such things as Massenet's "Marquise" and the "Credo" from "Otello" he gave with consummate art, while even the one or two entirely worthless pieces in his programme he contrived to invest with interest and charm. On the other hand, he was at his worst beyond question in Lotti's "Pur dicesti," which he chose to embellish with some entirely uncalled for fioriture very indifferently executed. Miss Alice Nielsen also contributed to the programme, giving Tosti's "Goodbye" and "Ah! fors' è lui," among other things, with considerable success, though a greater contrast to the subtle and finished art of M. Maurel than her well-schooled and conscientious but eminently uninspired performances could hardly be imagined. At the Queen's Hall on the same afternoon a concert of entirely familiar fare was vastly enjoyed by an enormous audience, Miss Maud MacCarthy, formerly a prodigy, but now a young lady of twenty, taking the solo part in Beethoven's violin concerto. She plays with neatness and intelligence, but her tone is lacking in volume, and the whole performance could hardly be reckoned a very great one. Schubert's Unfinished Symphony, the "Trauermarsch" from "Götterdämmerung," and "Till Eulenspiegel" were the other works heard, all of which were given in good style, though the quality of the brass in the Wagnerian item was once again sadly open to criticism. At the Bechstein Hall, Busoni was heard at his best in Rubinstein's seldom-played "Variations on an Original Theme," among other things, giving also César Franck's "Prélude, Chorale, et Fugue" in brilliant style, though his audience was smaller than it should have been—and would have been, no doubt, but for counter attractions elsewhere.

Another fine pianist lately heard has been Mr. Leonard Borwick, who likewise deserved a better house than he obtained. His playing came as near to perfection in its own particular style as the most critical could desire. Miss Adela Verne has also given further demonstration of her abilities under the same head, Mme. Albani, Mr. Santley, and an orchestra assisting. A new violinist of some promise, Mr. Arthur Catterall, appeared at the Stock Exchange Orchestral Society's Concert, while a new vocalist, Miss Olive Hilder, has also made a successful début. The second of the Palmer Fund Concerts given on Tuesday week is somewhat ancient history now, but several works of interest by young British composers were brought to a hearing thereat—among which a set of pianoforte preludes by Mr. Paul Corder and a string quartet by Mr. W. Y. Hurlstone were perhaps as promising as any.

A thrilling ghost story by "Sir Frederic H. Cowen" is a feature of the Christmas Number of M.A.P. Is this a case of intelligent anticipation? Dr. Cowen's many friends will, I am sure, be glad to think so.

LETTERS ON BOOKS.

MY DEAR MR. O'BRIEN,—Though I cannot be sufficiently grateful to you for the pains you have been at to furnish me with the necessary information to enable me to supply my young acquaintances with seasonable literature, yet I hope you will forgive me for remarking one omission. What have the elders done that they should be forgotten? Surely there are men, certainly there are women, to whom the book daintily bound and beautifully illustrated is a perpetual joy. Let me, then, briefly attempt to remedy your omission. Have you seen Mr. Charles Dana Gibson's new volume? Mr. Gibson's delightful humour has long since secured for him an admiring audience on this side of the Atlantic, and his admirers will owe him a further debt of gratitude for "Everyday People" (Lane). I have also seen two handsome volumes which would make a most desirable present in a new edition of Cary's "Dante" published by Messrs. Cassell. In this we have Dante's poetry wedded to the Doré illustrations, and all that type, paper, and binding can do lavished on the production. Then the lover of quaint old songs and beautiful printing would assuredly be made happy for a year by Mr. Graham Robertson's "French Songs of Old Canada" (Heinemann, 31s. 6d.). Mr. Robertson has so keen an eye for decorative effect that every page is a thing of beauty, and the colour of his illustrations is a triumph of artistic reticence. Another book which makes a special appeal to women is Lady Russell's "Three Generations of Fascinating Women" (Longmans, 31s. 6d. net). It is a chatty book of family gossip about the Hon. Mary Bellenden, Caroline, Countess of Ailesbury, and the Hon. Mrs. Damer, enriched with numerous reproductions of contemporary portraits and sketches. Quite another audience is appealed to by the series of portraits by Mr. E. C. Elliott, contained in the sumptuous volume. "Fifty Leaders of British Sport" (Lane). A finer series of characteristic photographs was never gathered together in one cover, and the biographical notes by Mr. Aflalo are far and away beyond the usual standard in such productions. Altogether, it is an ideal presentation volume for a sportsman, unless, of course, he is so big that he is inclined to feel jealous by reason of his non-inclusion in the distinguished company. But of all the publishers who devote their attention to the production of finely illustrated books, there is none who provide more lavishly than Messrs. Adam and Charles Black. Take the interesting volume published for the Fine Art Society of "British Water-Colour Art" (20s. net), containing reproductions in colour of the collection of drawings dedicated by the Royal Society of Painters in Water-Colours to their Majesties the King and Queen as a souvenir of the Coronation. Here we have an adequate history of the progress of the art of water-colour painting during the course of a century, adequately illustrated by reproduction of the work of the masters of that art. Ten years ago it would have been impossible to have obtained colour-printing of this quality in the United Kingdom, but to-day this is only one volume of a whole series of equal excellence printed in England. Many of them take the form of pen and paint pictures of other countries, and a more delightful souvenir of a visit abroad than one of these volumes could not be in any one's possession. Numbered amongst them is Sir Martin Conway's "The Alps" (20s. net), painted by Mr. A. D. McCormick, an association of author and artist, blessed with the happiest results. Indeed, one of the remarkable points about this series of Beautiful Books is the success which in each case has attended the choice of the collaborators in each volume. One expects sympathetic understanding, of course, when, as in "Venice" (20s. net), Mr. Mortimer Menpes and Miss Dorothy Menpes are jointly responsible for the book, or again in "Naples" (20s. net), of which Mr. A. Fitzgerald paints such charming pictures, and Mrs. Fitzgerald no less delightfully describes the place. But the happy choice is no less apparent in the volume about "Morocco" (20s. net), of which Mr. A. S. Forest as artist and Mr. S. L. Bensusan as author, give a brilliant, realistic picture of the near East.—I am, etc.,

GIRLS' GOSSIP.

DEAREST AMY,—The Duke and Duchess of Connaught were in the Royal box at the Savoy on the first night of "Pagliacci." The Duke looked remarkably well, in spite of what the papers say about his still suffering from the effects of his motor accident. Mrs. Brown Potter's "Columbine" gown is lovely, all soft white frillery, with an overskirt sparkling with silver. There were so many interesting things to look at that our heads were seldom still. A lady in the stalls had the most wonderful pearls, rows upon rows of them. A very pretty girl with dark eyes, hair, and eye-lashes sat in front of us, with a dainty little fair-haired mother whom everybody knew as a dramatic favourite. The scene in the second act was exactly like one of Mr. Mortimer Menpes' pictures. It was a good idea to put the little girl in front of the crowd and make her lay her doll down on the step of the little theatre. It was such a natural touch. The music was lovely.

We called at the Langham Hotel one afternoon last week to see a friend, and were much struck by the magnificent rooms, the spacious corridors, and the very handsome dining-room to which an annexe has quite recently been added, very light and bright and pretty, and capable of dining forty persons in addition to the 200 whom the dining-room proper accommodates. The view right up Portland-place to Regent's Park is a fine vista, and one of the advantages of the hotel is the wide and roomy porch which completely shelters those who alight, stretching quite across the pavement. The L.C.C. does not allow this convenient feature in more recently-erected hotels. The thick carpets and wide staircase with its easy, shallow steps, give a luxurious appearance to the hotel, and add to the quiet and freedom from noise which are among its advantages. The place is eloquent of real, substantial comfort, and is much patronised by English county families as well as by our Colonial visitors. They appreciate the position, which is close to all the principal West-End shops. The manager has brought out a very interesting guide to London calculated to be very useful to visitors with its map and quantity of general information. The illustrations are beautifully done, more particularly one of the river by night, on p. 121.

I had never been inside Robinson and Cleaver's doors until one day last week, when I felt as if I had made a great discovery. Never have I seen anything so beautiful as the interior. Alabaster pillars support the roof, which is in opaque glass painted in beautiful designs. The capitals of these pillars are in the most glorious colour, the alabaster deepening into a soft pinkish orange tan. Can you make anything of that? If not, think of the evening sky when a glow overspreads it from the west after the sun has disappeared. Well, the alabaster suggests solidified sunset. The great staircase, too, is white veined marble, with alabaster balustrades. Here again the colour waxes and wanes, sometimes as soft and delicate as a magnolia petal, and again as deep and glowing as an azalea leaf. I could hardly attend to the business in hand for gazing at all this beauty overhead, but matters of the moment had to have their way, and I was soon immersed in Christmas presents. Whether to choose a box of gloves, a case of embroidered handkerchiefs, a set of Irish crochet d'oyleys, hand-embroidered cushion covers or table centres, lace and linen bedspreads frilled all round, or a purse, a bag, a miniature or photograph frame, a smoking set, or an inkstand, silver brush tray, or case for scent bottle, occupied some time. In the dress department I admired very much a little monk's gown for a child, forming the sweetest little dressing-gown with hood, just the thing for toddling to the bathroom in these cold mornings. The taffeta silk petticoats struck me as being very cheap, and the furs remarkably so, and all of the most up-to-date shapes, quite the right present for a girl. In fact, there is everything under this splendid canopy of ornamental glass. Robinson and Cleaver's is by far the most spacious and most beautiful shop I have ever seen.

I learned the other day from a visit to Spinks and Sons' galleries in Piccadilly that the little Egyptians played tipcat as far back as the year 1500 B.C., and probably at a still remoter date. Their marbles were larger than those our modern boys play with. Does that indicate larger fingers and, on the ex pede Herculem system, a bigger frame than our boys enjoy? The ancient Egyptians had cleverer targets than ours. Why do we not copy them? Each ring is detached from the rest and slung from above, so that the exact position of each shot can be told, and, besides, the target lasts for ever, being made of iron. There are thousands of curios, large and small, in the galleries, most of them marked at very moderate prices. For instance, a present for a child of bead armlets 1,500 years old can be bought for 5s. 6d. Nor are the exhibits confined to any one period. There is a bronze jug from the Roman tomb of a Gallic chief, and there are Jacobean relics and a great number of specimens of silver articles from the reign of Elizabeth onward through the Georgian era. The complete silver toilet set of George II., for instance, with inscription, and dated 1758, is there in its own original case. The very table on which Napoleon played draughts on the Undaunted, on his way to Elba, and the actual draughtmen that he used, are among the interesting historical relics. Who will buy it? Napoleon gave it to Captain Usher, who commanded the Undaunted on that memorable occasion. But he found time to play draughts with his famous passenger, as an inscription on the table shows. Napoleon had a habit of continually fidgeting with his fingers, and on the underside of the table are the marks left by his restless scratchings and rubbings. A silver bowl from one of the vessels of the Spanish Armada, picked up by some English fishermen, is another ancient relic. Unique examples of ivory carving by Moritz Keller occupy a prominent position in this fascinating collection, which includes a number of pictures by well-known artists. Several are by old masters. It is a polite education to examine the contents of the rooms, and any one wishing to give a unique present should not fail to pay them a visit.

The two youngest Vice-Presidents of the League of Mercy, Miss Irene Hentschel and Miss Doris Joel, are organising a children's fancy-dress ball in aid of the funds of the League, to be held at the Hotel Cecil on the 29th of this month from 6.30 to 10.30. The young impresarii are receiving every encouragement in their maiden effort. Mr. Alfred de Rothschild is lending his private band, under the direction of Mr. Carl Heubert. As President of the Strand district of the League, Mr. Carl Hentschel, father of one of these enterprising young ladies, has formed an influential committee. Prizes will be given for the best fancy dresses, and entertainments will be provided between the dances. Mrs. Wordsworth has arranged a display of fancy dancing by her pupils. The ball is sure to be a great success.

There was a time when barrels of oysters were highly appreciated as Christmas gifts, but the poor bivalves are rather in disgrace at present, and those who like to bestow good fare have to send cases of wine and delicacies of the table. I hear that there is a demand this year for parcels of the Escoffier Carlton preparations, and a guinea box of these must be a boon indeed in the country, where the delicious sauces, chutneys, poivrons, and pimientos are comparatively unknown. Anything more handy than their Catalane sauce for ragouts and stews you cannot imagine. One has only to put in the chicken or game, and let it slowly simmer.

The only really nice perfumes are those that smell of flowers. Is not that so? The most perfectly delicious that I know of is Mülhens' Violetta Graziella. A few drops scattered on one's handkerchief or muff make one's friends say "Oh, violets! Where have you hidden them away?" And the bottles are in themselves so pretty with violets on the label, a violet engraved on the glass stopper, which is tied down with a bit of ribbon in violet colours—viz., green, white, and purple. The box in which it is sent out is in the shape of a cradle lined with green silk and fitted with a fluffed-up pillow for its little stopper to rest on. There are soap and sachets of this delicious perfume at 62, New Bond-street, where we are always discovering pretty things when we go for our 4711 Eau de Cologne, now become one of the necessities of life. Our bathroom would not know itself without a bottle or two with the familiar blue and gold label. By the way, this Eau de Cologne has been the recipient of that very sincere but equally inconvenient form of flattery—imitation, even to the very colour of the label. So make sure that the numbers 4711 are on any that you buy. You must never be without a bottle of it on the toilet table. It is useful in many different ways. After the hair has been shampooed a good way of avoiding chill is to rub in a little 4711 among the roots. This makes the whole head in a glow of heat, and also helps to stimulate the skin and keep it up to the mark in the matter of raising a fine crop of hair for future use. And when one has toothache—but I must have told you that before, for the 4711 is my sovereign palliative for the disagreeable ailment that good old Sarah calls "the teethache, drat it!"

I told you a few weeks ago about the new clock that has neither dial nor hands, and yet tells the time much more distinctly than any other kind of chronometer. I have been so often asked about it that I went to Vickery's, in Regent-street, in order to equip myself with all information on the subject. They are not expensive, those in sterling silver costing but three guineas, others in gilt or oxidised steel being much lower in price. They stand five inches high, apart from the handles, and the figures that tell the time are so large and bold that one can see them right across the room. The hour is indicated by the upper line of figures, the minutes by those below, and it is amusing to watch the latter turn over to a new minute when the sixty seconds have run round. There are all kinds of other clocks there, and the daintiest possible watches, many of them hung from smart little pins and pendants. A particularly sweet little gold watch is ornamented with a diamond, ruby, and sapphire shamrock on the back. A very new idea is carried out in the flat watch cases, which are not what they seem, but contain a mirror and a tiny powder puff. Another useful combination is a silver-gilt oblong case, which contains a card case, mirror, powder puff, and sovereign purse. Some of them are set with jewels. The jewelled hat-pins, sold in a case containing a pair, make pleasing presents, being gold or silver set with rubies, or rubies, pearls, and turquoises. A little hammered gold mirror that can be carried in the glove is both cheap and useful. It can be hung on the chain of a châtelaine, but nestles very comfortably in the palm of the hand inside the glove. Among the pretty charms for the watch chain is a copy of the little greenstone Maori god sent to the owner of St. Amant just before the Derby this year by an anonymous correspondent, who implored him to wear it, as it was a pledge of victory.

And yet another novelty of Vickery's is a necklet of platinum and fine gold worked in a design of points, the central one quite deep and the others graduated. Each vandyke is pointed with a pearl drop. Some of them are studded with precious stones. The gold chain necklets, with pearl and turquoise slide and tassels to match, are becoming, and very new are the gold and turquoise necklets, with mother-o'-pearl drops, each drop having a ruby set in it. Other stones are used in the same way. I do not know when I have seen so many novelties. There are inkstands with clocks attached, tea tables with spirit lamp, kettle, and plate or cakestands all in one; birthday spoon with correct sign of the zodiac for each month, claret jugs with ice-well centres, umbrellas with watches in the very ornamental handles, hand-painted china photograph frames, patented lock-up letter trays that can be used upon the knees, so comfortable for travelling, etc., dog or pussy baskets, with divisions for its collars, ribbons, handkerchiefs (every self-respecting dog and cat has pocket handkerchiefs nowadays, and even table-napkins marked with their monograms), double post-boxes for the hall table, with accommodation for small parcels, and a

THE CURE OF CONSUMPTION.—The following is an extract from a letter written by Mr. J. Lock, Rowborough, and proves beyond doubt the statement that Consumption (even in its latest and apparently hopeless cases) is perfectly curable: "I write to say that Dr. Alabone undertook my son's case when other doctors had given up all hope in the matter. Dr. B——, senior physician of the —— Hospital, said a few weeks—five or six—will 'end it.' In six weeks my son had reached Sandown; four months later he was walking ten to twelve miles. He is now roughing it in South Africa, and is in excellent health."—"The Cure of Consumption, Chronic Bronchitis, Asthma, and Catarrh," price 2s. 6d., by E. W. ROBINSON SOUTH AFRICAN BANKING COMPANY.

The Ordinary General Meeting was held on WEDNESDAY, DECEMBER 7, at the Offices, 1, Bank Buildings, Mr. J. B. Robinson presiding.

THE CHAIRMAN said that, taking into consideration the depressed state of business during the period covered by the report, he thought that the shareholders would agree with the board in considering it a satisfactory document. As compared with the previous year's accounts the totals were smaller. That was to say, their liabilities and assets had been reduced, but in view of the almost general decline in all branches of business he did not suppose they would have expected to find it otherwise. Restrictions had been the order of the day on all sides. The board were of opinion that in such times as they had been going through a very substantial proportion of the bank's assets ought to be kept in a liquid form. The cash in hand and on short loans—which was for all practical purposes also cash—and native gold in transit amounted together to £2,520,808, being an increase of £397,265 as compared with these items in the previous balance-sheet, and the amount was greater than the whole of their liability on deposit accounts. This rather unusual state of affairs, from a banking point of view, was partly explained by the decision of the directors to close the Port Elizabeth and Durban branches, this resulting in the advances made by these branches being called in. The gross profit of the year was £154,657. That it had been necessary to make a substantial provision for bad and doubtful debts was a regrettable fact. Deducting the charges from the gross profit, and adding the sum brought forward, there remained £133,514 available for dividend and other purposes. An interim distribution of 2½ per cent. was made last April, and a further payment of 2½ per cent. was now recommended, making 5 per cent. for the year, and leaving £58,514 to be carried forward. They would, he felt sure, admit that this was a wise provision to make against the dull times which had exercised such a baneful influence upon all banking transactions throughout South Africa. During the past two years the position of affairs generally in that country had been most unsatisfactory. It had been a most trying period to the board, and great efforts had had to be made to protect the interests of the bank. To give an idea of the terrible state of things that had prevailed since the termination of the war, he might mention that fully one-half of the bills of exchange drawn through their bank on South Africa were dishonoured, and they had had to fall back upon the drawers of the bills, which, in many instances, caused a considerable amount of embarrassment. There were now indications which led him to believe that there would be a great improvement in the general position of affairs in South Africa before very long. Labour with which to carry on work at the mines was the great factor at the moment, and it would appear that there was a large number of unskilled labourers arriving on the Rand. This should lead to a considerable increase in the production of gold. In the circumstances the board did not deem it advisable to pay a larger dividend than 5 per cent. for the year. The position of the bank was sound, and when they considered the great depression in all departments of trade, both in this country and in South Africa, he felt that the results obtained during the past year must be regarded as very satisfactory. He drew attention to the fact that the shareholders had no liability, as the shares were fully paid. The assets, as shown in the balance-sheet, exceeded the amount of the liabilities by £165,000. When they further took into consideration the auditors' note, to the effect that the assets had been taken at or under cost price, and that their aggregate market value at the lowest figures quoted on September 30 last was in excess of the amount at which they stood in the accounts, he thought that the shareholders would realise the strong position held by the bank at present, and how great were its possibilities in respect of future operations. With care, and the certainty of better times, they might reasonably look forward to an expansion of trade and an increase in their banking transactions. He then moved the adoption of the report.

Mr. Charles F. Carrington having seconded the motion, the report was adopted and the proposed dividend was agreed to.

The Chairman, in the course of further remarks, said that the position of the mines on the Rand had been one of great difficulty. It was the general opinion that when the war was over the natives would come down from the interior in large numbers and seek work under the British flag. But they did not do so. He now began to see a prospect of the mines being got to work at full speed. The shareholders must not be carried away by what he said. So many previous calculations in this matter had been falsified that he did not wish to convey the idea that there was a certainty of the necessary labour being obtained. There were, however, favourable indications. The Chinese were coming freely, and in the past two months the number of natives at the mines had increased. He personally preferred natives to Chinese. It was a bitter thing to him to have to import Chinese. There was an enormous black population in South Africa, and it seemed a pity that so much of the money paid in wages should be taken out of the country. He had been asked questions with regard to the South Randfontein Mine. Three months ago they had the greatest difficulty in keeping it going. The "boys'" time had expired, and they wanted to return to their brothers. It was astonishing how fond they were of their brothers when they wished to leave the mines. However, the management succeeded in inducing some of them to remain, and crushing was continued, but the results from crushing rock in a haphazard way were very different from what they were when it was done systematically. In conclusion, he remarked that nothing would be wanting on the part of the directors to protect and promote the interests of the shareholders.

Having briefly referred to the outlook in Rhodesia, the Chairman moved the adoption of the report.

Dr. Hans Sauer seconded the motion, which, after a short discussion, was adopted, and a resolution was afterwards passed electing Mr. Julius Jeppe a director of the company.

Science has done great things for the invalid, even putting on one side the skill of doctors and surgeons and the discoveries of remedial and alleviative medicines. Take the case of furniture alone. Could a better form of Christmas gift be chosen than one or other of those appliances which remove so much of the discomfort and dependence on others so often inseparable from illness? A chair, for instance, in which the patient can move himself from one room to another, is a boon that can be appreciated fully only by those who have known for weeks what it is to be entirely dependent on others for the slightest change of position. A look at Carter's catalogue of the appliances to be found at 6A, New Cavendish-street, W., shows these wheeled chairs and couches adapted to every form of illness. The Orthopædic spinal chair, especially when fitted with the literary machine, is skilfully and accurately adapted to the needs of sufferers from curvature or weakness of the spine. And equally merciful is the Aseptic mechanical bedstead, by means of which the very heaviest patient can be raised without noise or vibration. One need not be an invalid to properly appreciate the adjustable sun umbrella, which can be fastened on a chair, a carriage, or in the sands and adjusted at any angle. It, too, can be fitted with the reading table. One of the First Aid sets ought to be in every house

When you are choosing crackers do not fail to get Tom Smith's Russo-Japanese. They are very clever, and with them is given a sheaf of paper pictures showing the course of shells from vessel to vessel, and finishing with a tiny explosion. The Louis Wain cats are good, too, and you will admire the Dutch china box, with the quaint pictures of Dutch children and the pretty bits of china contained inside each.

I shall have some nice recipes for you next week

ENTRE NOUS.

A FULL detailed account of the Twenty-fifth Truth Toy and Doll Show, held at the Royal Albert Hall last week, will be found at pp. 1599-1607 of this issue. I think it is universally agreed that the Show itself was an unqualified success, and my heartiest thanks are due to all those ladies and gentlemen who have contributed to that result by their donations and by their personal work in the manufacture of toys and the dressing of dolls. On the conclusion of the Show, the exhibits were despatched in the usual course to the various London Hospitals, Workhouses, Workhouse Schools and Infirmaries on my list, so far as the number would allow; and the 11,000 new sixpences will this week be handed over to the managers of the various institutions entitled to them for distribution in accordance with the wishes of the anonymous donor. In all some 30,000 children, most of them poor and friendless, and many of them sick and suffering, will have something to help them towards a merry Christmas, and I hope that those who have contributed towards this end may find their own Christmas the merrier for what they have done.

In one respect, however, this year's Toy Show was very unfortunate. The downpour of rain throughout the first day of the Show naturally reduced the attendance far below the usual numbers; and, although the attendance on Thursday was a record one, the surplus on that day was not sufficient to extinguish the deficit on the other. The total amount paid for admission on Wednesday was £46 10s.; and on Thursday £89 2s.—in spite of the fact that admission was free after 5 p.m. The visitors did not, I regret to say, avail themselves liberally of the collecting boxes, and only £8 15s. 2½d. was obtained from this source. The total proceeds of the Toy Show were £144 7s. 2½d., as against £172 0s. 3d. last year; this result is the more unfortunate, as the contributions to the Toy Fund are also considerably below the usual amount. The final accounts, however, cannot be made up for another week or two; and I still venture to hope that, as has nearly always hitherto happened, those of my readers who have not yet assisted will come to the rescue in sufficient numbers to prevent the Fund being closed this year with a deficit.

Apropos of the Truth Toy Show, I was much concerned to learn that Messrs. Catesby and Sons had been summoned for creating an obstruction in Tottenham Court-road in connection with an exhibition they were holding at the headquarters of Cork Lino. In default of any better means of assisting the Albert Hall Show, the firm had kindly undertaken to exhibit for me some special advertisements during their own exhibition; so that it looks as if I might have indirectly contributed to the offence complained of. However, as I have not been summoned, I conclude that the police thought that Cork Lino was what the crowd round Messrs. Catesby's premises was really in search of. And I dare say that they were right.

An incident that occurred at the Albert Hall last week may interest some of my American friends. Among other toys exhibited was a large monkey, which had been decorated with a flag—I suppose the first that came handy. A small boy, about 4 ft. 6 in. high, was observed to bestow a great deal of attention on this exhibit, after which he consulted a policeman. He went back to the monkey, looked at it anxiously for some time, and then went off to another policeman. Policeman No. 2 referred him to my manager. "I say," said the youth, in the accents of the great Republic of the West, "what's that monkey doing with the Amurrkan flag, anyhow?" The manager pleaded ignorance. "Guess there ain't any connection between the Amurrkan flag and monkeys, is there?" said the youth, rather hotly. My representative, being a man of peace, hastily replied that there was none. "Hadn't you better take it down?" said the small boy. My manager, not wishing to provoke international complications at a festival of peace and goodwill, told the representative of the U.S.A. that if it would give him any pleasure, he might remove the flag himself. The youth did so promptly. "Look here," he said, in a more friendly tone, when he had possessed himself of the trophy, "if there's a bird anywhere, you might put it on that." My representative thanked him for the concession, and looked about anxiously for an eagle, feeling that it would not be safe to plant the Stars and Stripes on any humbler fowl. There being no eagle in the collection, he ventured to suggest a lion, and the British public will be pleased to hear that the young American Cousin readily accepted this compromise. The incident then closed.

Since my appeal in last week's issue I have received the following donations:—

H. A. P., £2; The Ward Room Officers H.M.S. Vengeance, £4 8s.; E. and V., 10s.; W. H. L., 10s.; C. W. L., £1; G. J., £1 1s.; Nancy, £1; J. P. M., £2 2s.; H. I have also received a "Welsh milkmaid" from Mrs. Nicholl, three dolls from Mrs. Jenkins, and a dressed doll from Sister Bertha.

The King and Queen, who are to spend the Christmas holidays at Sandringham, will travel direct from Wolferton to Rowsley on Monday, January 2, when they are going to Chatsworth on a visit to the Duke and Duchess of Devonshire. It is understood that their Majesties will arrive at Windsor Castle from Chatsworth on Saturday, January 7, for a stay of between three and four weeks, after which the Court will remove to Buckingham Palace for the opening of Parliament.

The King had three days of excellent shooting last week in Lord Cadogan's extensive preserves on the Culford Estate, between Bury St. Edmunds and Thetford. Game was very abundant, and the birds were in capital condition. On the fourth day of the Royal visit their Majesties drove through Bury St. Edmunds to Ickworth, where they drank tea with Lord and Lady Bristol. Ickworth is a magnificent house, the central part being a rotunda, with a cupola 140 ft. in height, which is connected with the two wings by curved corridors. It was built from his own designs by Frederick, fourth Earl of Bristol and Bishop of Derry, who had lived long in Italy. The gardens are fine, and the well-wooded and much varied park is eleven miles in circuit. The King and Queen were much interested in the collection of pictures, which includes a number of admirable portraits and two very fine works by Velasquez.

On Tuesday the Queen drove to Elveden Hall, and visited Lady Iveagh, and on Friday her Majesty spent the afternoon at Hardwicke, the picturesque old seat of the Cullums, which is now occupied by Mr. and Lady Evelyn Guinness. Hardwicke is attractive, both for the pictures, library, and antiquities, and for the beautiful gardens and pinetum.

The King will pay a visit to the King and Queen of Portugal at Lisbon during the latter part of March.

It has always been the custom to summon Parliament to meet for despatch of business at the Council which the Sovereign has invariably held about the middle of December. When Parliament has been again prorogued shortly before Christmas the arrangement has been taken to indicate either that a dissolution is intended in January, or that the Ministers are contemplating resignation. There has been considerable speculation as to the real cause of the decision again to prorogue Parliament at last week's Council. Probably it is a mere freak of the Cabinet to avoid being too soon tied down to begin at a definite date a Session which they must dread.

The Palace ceremonies before Easter will be two evening Courts at Buckingham Palace, and three Levees at St. James's Palace. One of the Courts will be held during the last week in February, and the other during the first week in March. The first two Levees are to be held about the same time as the Courts, and the hour will be noon. The third Levee will be held early in April by the Prince of Wales for the King. Their Majesties intend to receive the Corps Diplomatique at the first Court, and the Ambassadors and other Chefs de Mission will be invited in rotation to the subsequent Courts of the season.

The Prince and Princess of Wales, who are expected at York Cottage, Sandringham, on Friday, will proceed to Windsor the week after next, and they are to reside for a short time at Frogmore Lodge, where the Princess will remain during the Prince's visit to Ireland. The Princess is to arrive at Marlborough House for the season about Monday, January 30, and she will be joined there a few days later by the Prince of Wales.

H.R.H. and the Princess were the guests last week of Lord and Lady Pembroke at Wilton House, near Salisbury, from Monday until Friday evening. The Duke and Duchess of Portland, Duke and Duchess of Roxburghe, Lord Durham and Lady Anne Lambton, and Lord and Lady de Grey were included in the house party. The Prince had three days' shooting in the Hare Park, Groveley Wood, and Haddon preserves; and over 4,000 head were killed, the bag consisting principally of pheasants.

The Prince of Wales is to pay a visit to Lord and Lady Londonderry towards the end of next month at Mount Stewart, their seat near Belfast.

The sales of the Duke of Cambridge's property have realised about £110,000. The various collections disposed of were not made by the late Duke, but by the two Dukes of Gloucester and by Princess Mary, Duchess of Gloucester, who acquired nearly all the pictures (which fetched £35,000) by bequest or purchase. It is quite certain that Princess Mary never would have left all this property to her nephew, the Duke of Cambridge, absolutely, if she had entertained the slightest suspicion that it would ultimately figure in auction rooms.

The Duke of Connaught is to leave England about January 24 for an official tour of inspection of the forces at Gibraltar and at Malta and in Egypt. The Duke, who is to be accompanied by the Duchess of Connaught, will embark at Portsmouth for Gibraltar on board the cruiser Essex.

The Duke of Saxe-Coburg-Gotha is to arrive in England this week, and he will spend about a month at Claremont with his mother, the Duchess of Albany. H.R.H. has been serving during the last few months with his regiment of Prussian Foot Guards, which is stationed at Potsdam. The Duke of Saxe-Coburg-Gotha and the Duchess of Albany will pay a visit to the King and Queen shortly, either at Sandringham or at Windsor Castle.

Lord and Lady Dudley returned to Dublin last week from their short visit to England, consequent on the illness of Mr. John Ward. They went to the Viceregal Lodge, where their children had been staying during their absence. Christmas, wherever spent, is a very busy Viceregal time, and not least so to Lord and Lady Dudley, who personally take an active part in making Christmas a happy time for a large number of those whose happiness depends on the benevolence of others. Lady Dudley does much Christmas shopping in Dublin, where the shops make a goodly show, and are well worthy of the capital of Ireland.

The arrangements of the Irish Viceregal Court have necessarily undergone many changes, and no doubt will be liable to others owing to the visit of the Prince of Wales to Ireland in January. The Castle season begins on February 1, the preparations for which, and for the visit of the Prince of Wales to Lord and Lady Dudley at that time, will cause the assemblage of the officials of the Viceregal household at Dublin Castle during January. The presence of the Prince of Wales at the first Levee and Drawing Room of the season will naturally give unusual éclat to these Court ceremonials. Dublin may look forward to a great muster of society, which will give a much-needed impetus to trade. Already houses are being taken and rooms being secured at the leading hotels for the "Castle season." Lord and Lady Dudley are making up a distinguished house-party for the Royal visit. Lord Ardilaun will also have a party to stay at Ashford for the shooting.

Lord Justice FitzGibbon's usual party assembles next week at his villa at Howth for Christmas. This comfortable residence was built by the Lord Justice over thirty years ago, in a picturesque situation on the north side of the Hill of Howth, everlooking Balscadden Bay, of old historic fame in connection with Grace O'Malley's raid on Howth Castle and its youthful heir. Under no roof-tree in Ireland have so many men of distinction been assembled within the last thirty years, as under the hospitable roof of the Lord Justice's villa, on the annual occasions of his unique Christmas parties. Amongst those still holding a leading position in the world who have been the Lord Justice's guests at Howth are the Prime Minister, Mr. John Morley, Lords Roberts and Wolseley, Professor Mahaffy, Mr. George Wyndham, Sir J. West-Ridgeway, Monsignor Molloy, Lords Ashbourne, Rathmore, and O'Brien.

Lord Justice FitzGibbon is possibly the cleverest of Ireland's clever men, and with the most interesting personality. His capacity for work is very great. Though no courtier, he has been the friend of successive generations of Irish Lord-Lieutenants. The Irish Church owes him a debt of gratitude greater than it owes to any other layman in Ireland. He has been its great financier. His energy in its cause, as in that of anything which he takes up, has been untiring. Last, not least, he is the personal friend of both the Catholic and Protestant Archbishops of Dublin.

Mr. Balfour has appointed Mr. J. A. Kempe to be Comptroller and Auditor-General, in the place of Mr. Richmond, who retires next week. The salary is £2,000 a year. Mr. Kempe is a son of Prebendary Kempe, who was long Vicar of St. James's, Piccadilly, and has held the office of Assistant Comptroller for some years, and he was previously Deputy Chairman of the Board of Customs. He commenced his Civil Service career as a clerk in the Treasury, and he was private secretary to the late Lord Iddesleigh (then Sir Stafford Northcote) while he was Chancellor of the Exchequer from 1874 until 1880 under Lord Beaconsfield.

Lord James of Hereford was requested by the Government to preside over the Free Church of Scotland Commission, but he declined to undertake the duty. Lord Elgin is admirably suited for the work, and he will have a very strong colleague in Lord Kinnear, who was to have been invited to assist the House of Lords in the re-hearing of the case, but for some reason or other this arrangement was given up. Sir Ralph Anstruther is a sensible, well-known, and popular country gentleman, whose interest in Church affairs is hereditary, and he thoroughly understands the complex workings of the Scottish ecclesiastical system.

Sir Frederick Fitzwygram, who has just died at the age of eighty-one, had a long military career before he entered the House of Commons as Tory Member for the Fareham Division of Hampshire in 1885, and he retained his seat until 1900, when he retired from public life. He served with the Inniskilling Dragoons in the Crimea, and afterwards he passed several years in India in command of the 15th Hussars. Sir Frederick commanded the Cavalry Brigade at Aldershot after leaving his regiment, and for five years he held the office of Inspector-General of Cavalry. He was an excellent and a very popular officer.

Sir Frederick purchased the Leigh Park estate, on the borders of Hants and Sussex, from the late Mr. Stone, M.P., about thirty-five years ago, and he had since made that place his principal residence. There was usually a large house party at Leigh during Goodwood race week. The handsome house, which was rebuilt in 1864, is in the so-called Domestic Gothic style. The gardens are very fine, and the park, which comprises seven hundred acres of woodland, contains a lake with several islands planted with rhododendrons. Leigh is one of the most attractive country seats in South-east Hants.

The late Mr. Cartwright, of Edgcote, near Banbury, owned large family estates in Oxfordshire and Northamptonshire, and he was one of the best known residents in these two counties, in both of which he worked hard, both as a magistrate and in the management of all departments of public affairs. Mr. Cartwright, whose father was for some years one of the members for Oxfordshire, took a deep interest in agricultural matters. He was a pleasant, hospitable, and sensible man, and was very popular in his neighbourhood, and he will be much and long missed by all classes.

The appointment of Lord Winchester to be Lord Lieutenant of Hampshire, in the place of the late Lord Northbrook has given much satisfaction. Lord Winchester (whose father held this office for many years) is a very popular landlord. He lives a great deal at Amport St. Mary's, his place near Andover, and he is the head of one of the oldest families in the county.

Lady Arthur Hervey, the widow of the late Bishop of Bath and Wells, died on Thursday at Winchester, where she had resided during the last ten years. Lady Arthur, who was a daughter of Mr. John Singleton, married Lord Arthur Hervey in 1839, and she has died at the age of ninety-one. She was a clever, sensible woman, with a strong determination of character, and it was no secret that during her husband's long episcopate she exercised considerable influence in diocesan affairs. Lady Arthur was a most genial hostess, and she dispensed generous hospitality for many years at her husband's rectory in Suffolk, and afterwards at the delightful Palace at Wells, where the liberal traditions of Lord Auckland's episcopate were worthily maintained by his successor.

The sudden death of Mr. Norman Maccoll has caused deep sorrow to a large circle of friends. When quite a young man he was selected by Sir Charles Dilke in 1869 to succeed Hepworth Dixon as editor of the Athenæum, and he held that position for about thirty-one years. It was an admirable choice, Mr. Maccoll was an ideal editor for such a journal. He was a man of high culture, wide reading, profound scholarship, and remarkable literary judgment, to which it may be added that he was also tactful, shrewd, cautious, and kind-hearted. He soon raised the Athenæum to the high position which it has held for many years, being a man of the most thorough independence, and at no time amenable to any sort of personal influence. It was with a view to emancipating his paper from either favouritism or the great objection of private pique that Sir Charles Dilke made the entirely new departure in 1869, which proved so brilliantly successful. It was well known that Dr. Doran had expected to succeed Hepworth Dixon, but his disappointment at being passed over vanished on his being appointed editor of Notes and Queries. For about a year Mr. Maccoll was joint editor of the Athenæum in conjunction with Sir Charles Dilke.

Lord and Lady Lansdowne, who have been entertaining some week-end parties at Bowood Park, will receive a number of guests there for the county ball at Chippenham, which is to take place on Tuesday, January 10.

The Duke and Duchess of Roxburghe will entertain a large house party during the holidays at Floors Castle, the family seat near Kelso. They spent the autumn at Floors, but have been away during the last three weeks, visiting Lord and Lady Pembroke at Wilton House; Lord and Lady Savile, at Rufford Abbey; and Mr. and Mrs. Charles Wilson, at Warter Priory. It is probable that the Prince and Princess of Wales will pay a visit next year to the Duke and Duchess of Roxburghe at Floors.

A few weeks back I published a curious letter, addressed to the creditors of the Maison Helbronner by the liquidator's secretary. The letter intimated that if it would be any convenience to the creditors, the liquidator himself was prepared to pay them off in cash, subject to a discount of 15 per cent., and gave at the same time a pretty plain hint that if they expected any dividends they would probably have to wait at least six months. It has since been brought to my notice that the liquidator is no other than Mr. Louis Sinclair, M.P., the principal shareholder in the insolvent company; in fact, according to the latest returns, he held all but 200 of the shares issued (9,655 out of 9,855). Practically, therefore, it comes to this, that Mr. Sinclair is offering 17s. in the £ to the creditors of his own concern. As he is himself, of course, a perfectly solvent gentleman, being a Member of Parliament, this shows the advantage of carrying on business under the Companies Acts.

The Episcopal appointments which were announced last week have given general satisfaction. It has been known for some time past that Bishop Gore would be the first Bishop of Birmingham. He sacrifices £700 a year by the transfer from Worcester, and as there is no episcopal residence for the new See, the Bishop will have to find his own house, which will probably be at Edgbaston. St. Philip's Church is to be the cathedral of the diocese, and it has been wisely decided to make no change in the services or in the position of the Rector, as the appointment of a Dean and Chapter is not contemplated. The Bishop's throne is to be placed in the church, which will be available for ordination and other episcopal functions. All Church parties at Birmingham are delighted by Dr. Gore's appointment, and he will be warmly welcomed by the Nonconformists of the city.

The Bishop Suffragan of Southwark, who is promoted to the See of Worcester, has enjoyed a large and varied experience both of organising and administrative work and of parochial duties. He has well earned his promotion. Dr. Yeatman-Biggs has laboured hard and with conspicuous success in the diocese of Rochester during the last thirteen years, and he is liked and esteemed by both clergy and laity. He has always taken a most hearty interest in educational affairs. The Bishop, who married a sister of the late Lord Dartmouth and of the Bishop of Lichfield, is a "squarson," as he owns a family estate of over 5,000 acres in Dorsetshire and Wiltshire, and Stockton, his place between Salisbury and Warminster, is a beautiful old Elizabethan manor-house, which is surrounded by fine woods. Stockton has been let for some years to Lord Clanwilliam, whose predecessor in the tenancy was Mr. E. P. Tennant. The See of Worcester is now worth £4,200 a year, and it is rumoured that the new Bishop will make Hartlebury Castle his residence. This "palace" has not been occupied by Bishop Gore, who preferred to live in Worcester in a house which he had himself purchased.

Archdeacon Diggle's promotion places the Rectory of Birmingham (of which a number of evangelical trustees are the patrons) in the gift of the Crown for this term, and Mr. Balfour will no doubt consult with Bishop Gore before he fills up the vacancy. The living is worth about £1,500 a year, with residence. The Archdeaconry of Birmingham (value £200 a year) again passes to the Crown; and it is expected in the city that Mr. Balfour will appoint the Rev. V. H. Carnegie, late Rector of Great Witley, who succeeded the Bishop of Manchester as Rector of St. Phillips, on the presentation of the Prime Minister.

Archdeacon Diggle, who recently refused the Suffragan Bishopric of Burnley in succession to the Bishop of Southwell, replaces Bishop Bardsley at Carlisle, where he will be most cordially welcome, as he made himself a great favourite in the diocese during the five years that he filled the office of Archdeacon of Westmorland and Canon Residentiary of Carlisle Cathedral. Archdeacon Diggle is an Evangelical of the Broad school, but he has never been known as a partisan. He is an admirable preacher and a most vigorous platform speaker. He has always taken a prominent part in educational matters and in social reform, and has been a zealous worker in all societies which have for their object an improvement in the condition of the poor. He will be both a popular and a busy working prelate. Archdeacon Diggle was beneficed at Liverpol for more than twenty years before he went to Carlisle, and in 1901 he was presented to the Rectory of Birmingham, where his work has been active and acceptable in both the religious and the social life of the city. Last year he was appointed to the Archdeaconry of Birmingham by Mr. Balfour, the patronage having fallen to the Crown in consequence of the promotion of Dr. Knox to the See of Manchester.

The Deanery of Rochester, which has been vacant for considerably over three months, has been accepted by Archdeacon Lane, one of the most popular and most highly esteemed ecclesiastics in the diocese of Lichfield, where he has been the sagacious and trusted adviser of three bishops. Archdeacon Lane has held the Rectory of Leigh, Staffordshire, since 1871, when he was presented to that benefice by his relative, Lord Bagot, and in 1888 Archbishop Maclagan (then Bishop of Lichfield) appointed him to the Archdeaconry of Stoke-on-Trent. He has been a useful and influential member of the Canterbury Convocation for more than twenty-four years.

Archdeacon Lane, who is a moderate High Churchman, has a great reputation as an organiser, and his abilities in this respect will be most valuable to the next Bishop of Rochester when the new See of Southwark is constituted and the present diocesan arrangement has to be altered. He belongs to an old Staffordshire family, rowed for three years at Oxford in the Balliol boat, and in 1858 and in 1859 he had a seat in the University boat. He was elected to a Fellowship of All Souls after taking his degree in 1860, and he held it until his marriage in 1879.

The Rev. H. Barrow Williams, an ornament of the Welsh Calvinistic Methodist Church at Llandudno, has just given a choice exhibition of Sabbatarian intolerance. The charitable public in the town have subscribed to provide every needy family with a Christmas dinner of "hot pot," and the proprietors of various bakehouses have offered to cook the "hot pots" on Christmas morning. To this arrangement the Rev. Mr. Williams has taken exception, on the ground that the baking and distribution of the dinners on the Sabbath will give "serious offence to the friends of the poor"! The poor may well pray to be delivered from such friends as this bigot. I wonder whether, if his ox or his ass fell into a pit on the Sabbath day, he would allow it to be pulled out.

I am afraid I am getting into hot water over the Welsh prophet. Just look at the following letter!—

Williston, Gelliwastad, Pontypridd,
December 9, 1904.

Sir,—You would have done well not to express your opinion of the Welsh spiritual revival, for your words exhibit both your ignorance of the character and effects of the movement, and your lack of spiritual vision.

You attempt to judge a matter which is absolutely beyond your poor materialistic philosophy. Behold your portrait in 1 Corinthians ii. 14.

Yours for Truth (and against Truth in this),
W. T. Evans.

Seldom has a more crushing indictment been presented against any Government than that contained in the article published by the Times last week on the re-armament of our Artillery. Early in the present year it was announced that after two and a half years of laborious inquiries and tests, the committee presided over by Sir George Marshall had at last definitely decided upon the new types of gun for Horse and Field Artillery. The delay in coming to this conclusion had undoubtedly been protracted to a most dangerous length, seeing that we had learned in the very first stage of the Boer War, five years ago, that our artillery was utterly obsolete, from which it follows that our Army is unfit to take the field against any European force. The least that could be expected, therefore, was that when the decision was arrived at steps would at once be taken to give effect to it; and most of us have been assuming in the interval that this was being done.

It now appears that we have been living in a fool's paradise. No sooner was the Army Council formed than the decision of Sir George Marshall's Committee was re-opened; and another eight or nine precious months were wasted in discussing the question before it was finally decided that the Committee was right after all. Worse than this, the Treasury has absolutely refused to find any money for the purpose, and, even had the first decision of the Committee been finally accepted, it would seem that not a penny of money would have been spent during the present year. Orders have been given for India, because India will have to pay the bill. Not an order, however, has been given for the Home Army, although it is stated that this will shortly be done.

We are, therefore, to-day in the same position as regards artillery as we were in 1899, when we found ourselves out-classed by the weapons of so distinguished a military Power as the Transvaal Republic. What is worse, we must remain more or less in this condition for a year or two to come, that being the time required to provide the whole of the Horse and Field Artillery with the new guns now about to be ordered. When one remembers that in 1895 a Liberal Government was turned out of office because the stock of cordite ammunition on hand was not considered sufficient for all possible contingencies, what ought to be done with a Government which, apart from all its other military muddling and blundering, has left the Army practically without artillery for a period which must eventually amount to something like seven years?

Not the least important point in this story for the attention of the taxpayer is the refusal of the Treasury to find money for a purpose of such vital national importance. For this refusal, of course, the Cabinet must be held responsible. From one point of view, no doubt, it is easy to understand the reluctance of the Chancellor of the Exchequer or any of his colleagues to add another two and a half millions to the bloated bill for military and naval services that they presented to Parliament last spring. But what we taxpayers have to consider is the astounding revelation that in spite of this appalling bill, and the constant expansion of the Army—without any visible addition to our military strength—it should be impossible to find money for a purpose the imperative necessity of which can be seen at a glance by any man in the street.

In this connection I would call attention to the disclosure recently made by Mr. T. G. Bowles, M.P., in his pamphlet, "National Finance," which has not attracted the notice it calls for. It is already known—at any rate to every reader of TRUTH—that the 35½ millions voted by Parliament for the Navy in 1903 was some £4,700,000 short of the total expenditure, the additional amount being raised under the Naval Works Acts, and from other sources. What Mr. Bowles has pointed out—so far as I know, for the first time—is that precisely the same process goes on in connection with the Army; and he gives the total bill for our military service during the year 1903-4 in the following shape:—

Army and Ordnance factories, voted in Supply by the House of Commons	£36,675,000
Appropriations in aid, intercepted and not voted in Supply	6,804,489
Issues under Barracks and Military Works Acts	2,950,000
Total	£46,429,489

Ten years previously the total expenditure under the same three heads was 21½ millions. It was, therefore, after adding 25 millions to our annual Army expenditure in the course of ten years that the Government was unable to find any money at all to begin the work of re-arming the Artillery. We have been groaning over the fact that our naval expenditure alone exceeds that of most of the Great Powers on their armies and navies combined. But it now appears that our Army alone cost us last year some 12 millions more than that of the biggest and most expensive army in the world. And what have we got for our money? Sir Ian Hamilton has just given us the benefit of his observations on the war in the East. It is that our Army in its present condition is simply a national danger. That this is not a mere rhetorical flourish is now brought home to us by the fact that the Army is to-day practically without any artillery which would be of the slightest effect against the weapons of any first-class Power, and must perforce be so for the best part of two years to come. That is what we get for our 46 millions, and for the 25 millions added annually to our expenditure as compared with ten years ago. Nothing that has yet come to light shows so conclusively the combination of financial profligacy and administrative incompetence with which the country is at present afflicted.

With reference to what was said in last week's TRUTH about the blackballing of a batch of medical officers at the Junior United Service Club, I have been asked to mention the following facts, and I gladly comply, for it is very much to the credit of the club that this shabby proceeding has been quashed:—

1. A Special Meeting of members was held on the 16th inst., to deal with the class blackballing, and at this each medical officer proposed was unanimously elected.
2. The roll of signatures of fifty members, submitted to the Committee of the club to assemble the Special Meeting (under the by-laws of the club), was made up entirely of officers who are outside the R.A.M.C. or the A.M.S.
3. Over 200 members attended the Special Meeting, and some very nice speeches were made about the R.A.M.C. officers.
4. Not one blackballer had the courage to hold up his hand against the election of the medical officers, when the vote in each case was put by the Chairman.

Prior to the receipt of the foregoing information, I had received the following from an Army Medical officer. Although the blackballing incident is now satisfactorily wiped out, the letter may be worth the notice of the blackballing fraternity at other clubs or on other occasions:—

> Referring to the recent blackballing of officers of the R.A.M.C. at Service clubs, I, for one, have determined that whenever I am on active service in future, I shall devote my services as far as possible to non-commissioned officers and men, leaving the officers who are so fond of blackballing, and refuse to acknowledge us as comrades, to shift for themselves when wounded or sick.
> If this plan were generally followed, I think it not unlikely that it would lead to a change of manners for the better.

After what has happened at the Junior United Service, I hope my medical friend will renounce this drastic policy. In any case, I would point out that he would be hitting the wrong man, for it is not the officers who know what fighting means and have seen doctors at work in the field, who are likely to object to meet R.A.M.C. officers in their clubs. It is a pretty safe inference that the warriors who do the blackballing on these occasions have done a good deal more soldiering in the armchairs at the clubs than on active service.

The latest example of the grievance resulting from the use of regimental recreation rooms for sergeants' dances comes from Cairo. On the occasion of a dance given by the N.C.O.s of the 2nd Inniskilling Fusiliers, the men were not only turned out of the library, etc., but also out of their billiard-room, which is a detached room, and could not be necessary for the purpose of a dance. This incident confirms what I said the other day, namely, that if men are turned out of the Institute rooms for the benefit of the N.C.O.s, they might at least be allowed temporary use of the sergeants' rooms. For instance, if on this occasion the sergeants desired to combine billiards with dancing in their evening's entertainment, there is no reason why the men should not have been allowed to use the sergeants' billiard-table in return. As I have said before, a great deal of ill-feeling arises out of this practice, and it is a pity that some strict regulations on the subject are not laid down.

There is much grumbling among the non-commissioned officers at the Depot of the Royal Marines in regard to the distribution of promotions to colour-sergeants among representatives of the three divisions. It is said to be the rule—and if it is not it ought to be—that an equal number of colour-sergeants shall be selected from the Chatham, Portsmouth, and Plymouth divisions; but at the present moment the thirteen colour-sergeants comprise ten from Plymouth, two from Portsmouth, and one from Chatham. The favour shown to the Plymouth division is the more unjust, as several men who have recently been promoted are junior to sergeants of the other divisions who are waiting for promotion, the last case being that of a man with only six years' seniority as sergeant, who had only joined the depot a week before he was promoted to colour-sergeant, and he would have had to wait at least three years for promotion from his own headquarters. In the depot the favouritism thus shown to the Plymouth division is attributed to the fact that the Commandant himself is an old Plymouth officer. The explanation may sound incredible, but no other appears to be forthcoming.

The legal principle that there is no wrong without a remedy has no application in the Army. The following is one of many cases that might be cited in support of that proposition. A gunner whose battery was stationed in the North-West Provinces was employed by the Cantonment Magistrate as "Conservancy Officer." As his time expired in June, 1905, and he did not think much of the outlook in the Army, he had not accepted service pay under the new rules. On hearing this, the Cantonment Magistrate, finding that he liked his employment, suggested that he should take service pay and remain on the station when his battery left. As the magistrate was a major in the Army, and assured the man that there would be no difficulty about his transfer to the relieving battery, the man fell in with the suggestion, accepted service pay, and extended his time.

This was in September last. The battery left in October, and, on putting in his name for transfer, the man was referred to a regulation which laid down that no man holding a staff billet such as his would be allowed to remain in a station when his battery or regiment left. The man complained to the C.O., who sympathised deeply, but said that he could do nothing, so the man departed with the battery, and lost his job—and his hopes of liberty. Here is a case where a soldier has been clearly induced to extend his service under a misapprehension for which he is not responsible. It is monstrous that a man should be kept in the Army under those circumstances, and there ought to be a means of correcting such mistakes.

Apropos of Latin and Greek, which have been so much under discussion lately, a parent offers a very forcible objection against the discontinuance of classics by cadets in their first year at Osborne. The point is that under the new system the boys are only in the College on probation for their first year, and a very substantial number of them are weeded out in the course of that time as unsuitable. It is very hard on these boys—most of whom are sure to be sent to public schools—to have dropped classics for a year; and under the circumstances parents may fairly ask that their Latin, at any rate, should be kept up. If the Admiralty claims the right to take boys from school "on appro." and reject those that it finds unsuitable for its purpose, it ought to see that they are not thereby prejudiced for other professions. Indeed, it is not the interest of the Admiralty that the boys should suffer in this way, for it attaches a risk to a naval cadetship which many parents may not care to take.

There are two other points in regard to Osborne which are worth the attention of the authorities—both of them parents' grievances. One is that the vacations do not coincide with those of other schools. This may seem a trifle to our naval administrators, but it is a source of widespread inconvenience to parents, and there can be no good reason for it. The other is that the feeding is not up to the mark. The father from whom I have this complaint makes no imputation upon the quality or quantity of the food; but he alleges that the meat is served in unpalatable "hunks," and is never properly hot, the result being that the boys do not eat enough, and much food is wasted. The best way of guarding against shortcomings of this kind is to let officers feed with the boys. At many public schools—if not at all—house-masters always dine with the boys in the middle of the day, and the smaller the boys the more necessity for some such arrangement.

The selection of Admiral Sir Edward Seymour to be the successor of Sir Nowell Salmon as Admiral of the Fleet will meet with general approval, for he is a most distinguished officer, and has probably seen more active service than any other naval officer. Sir Edward Seymour will vacate the command at Devonport in a few weeks, and he is to be replaced there by Vice-Admiral Beaumont, whose appointment has been a great surprise, as it was supposed that the post was intended to be filled by Sir Compton Domvile.

With reference to the wastage of condemned stores at the dockyards, a naval officer suggests that what is required in the interests of the taxpayer is a sale department, which should be always open, and at which all condemned goods should be sold in a business-like way. The present system is to throw everything, whatever its intrinsic value, on to a sort of scrap-heap, and hold a "rummage sale" every half-year. Any article, from a steam-launch or a harbour tug down to a windlass, when once condemned for the purpose which it happens to be fulfilling at the time, is put into the sale catalogue, without any regard to the possibility of utilising it in some other way, and practically without any regard to its market value, for all such goods are treated as scrap-iron, and sold at rubbish prices. There is no attempt to realise them at their true value, and, if there were, the system of holding half-yearly sales would be sufficient in itself to spoil the market. If a man were looking for a second-hand steam-launch or steam-winch, or whatever it may be, and knew that there was always a chance of finding such an article on sale at one of the dockyards, he might go there at once for it, but he is not likely to wait six months for the next sale.

There is another objection to the existing state of things which my correspondent does not mention, but which has been repeatedly pointed out in TRUTH. It is that the dockyard sales are controlled by a very small ring, who are able to manipulate the prices as they please, under an agreement to share the profits among themselves. I have more than once given instances of this, and it is a scandal that such a state of things should be allowed to continue. The suggestion of a permanent sale department is a very useful one. But, in addition to this, every dockyard ought to have a capital account and periodical stocktaking—things absolutely unknown at present—and the present haphazard and improvident style of condemning property of all descriptions ought to be done away with. As the officer above-quoted remarks, immense quantities of articles, which, though they may not be good enough for use on an effective battleship or cruiser, would be serviceable enough on tugs, harbour-ships, store-ships, etc., are now every year treated as scrap-iron, and sold for an old song—to the immense profit of the small ring which has got this trade into its hands, and corresponding loss of the unfortunate taxpayer. I suppose that the truth is that the Board of Admiralty is too much taken up with questions of strategy and other such administrative matters to look after these details. In that case the Admiralty itself requires reform.

Truth writes: "I have never heard anything but favourable accounts of Dr. Lunn's Excursions." Mediterranean Cruises. Swiss Skating Tours.—Secretary, 5, Endsleigh-gardens, N.W.

My attention has been called to an anomaly in the present arrangement under which naval officers can obtain cheap railway tickets when on leave. The rule is that a first-class return ticket can be obtained at single fare from any port in the Kingdom to London; but it does not apply to tickets from London. The result of this is that an officer whose ship happens to be at Cork can get a ticket at the reduced rate all the way to London and back; but if he happens to be at Chatham and wants to go, let us say, to Edinburgh or anywhere else beyond London, he can only get his cheap ticket to London, and must pay the full fare for the rest of the journey. I understand that men of the lower deck can get cheap tickets for any railway journey, and there is no reason why the same concession should not be extended to officers. Apparently there is some intention in that direction, but it has been carried out unintelligently.

A gentleman in Somerset House sends the following letter with reference to the recent remarks in TRUTH on the appointment of Mr. A. W. Soward as assistant secretary in the Estate Duty Office. Personally, of course, I know nothing of this matter. The previous paragraph reflected opinions that are held "inside"; but so does what follows, and as the more favourable opinion is likely to be the more disinterested, I cheerfully give Mr. Soward the benefit of it. I may add, that on fuller information, I believe there is no foundation for the suggestion of jobbery in connection with this gentleman's promotion, and that, be his merits what they may, he owes his advancement to them alone:—

Mr. Soward entered the service, as stated, in 1876 as a Lower Division clerk (now called the Second Division), and with very little chance of ever being anything more. He discharged his official duties with efficiency, and after about fourteen years he was promoted to the Higher Division solely on his merits. From that time he took his official work very seriously, and by much independent study made himself a thorough master of the law bearing on the Death Duties. When Sir William Harcourt brought in the now famous Act of 1894 Sir William Karslake chose Mr. Soward as his assistant in the lobby of the House to help in prompting the law officers on technical details while the Bill was passing through the House; and when the Bill was passed he certainly knew more about it than anybody else in the office. His text-book is certainly the best on the subject. He has never had any outside backing whatever.

I admit that among those he just passed over there is one extremely good man, but he has just turned sixty, and I believe the Treasury object to promoting men at that age—a very silly objection, in my opinion.

The tax-collectors are zealously carrying out the secret instructions which were given them some time ago. Throughout the country people are being bombarded with demands for payment of their taxes weeks in advance of the usual date. In some places the usual notice is accompanied by a special printed slip, headed "New Regulations, 1904-5," in which the collector intimates that he has been requested "to obtain early and prompt payment," and adds: "payment should be remitted on receipt of this notice." I think that this takes the cake for impudence, seeing that the notices were being sent out in the second week in December, and that the taxes so demanded are not legally due till January 1.

The object of this hustling is notorious. It is simply to enable the Chancellor of the Exchequer to get the benefit in this year's revenue of a large proportion of the taxes which in the normal course would go over into the next financial year. No doubt that is an important object from the point of view of Mr. Austen Chamberlain, more especially as the next is pretty certain to be the last Budget for which he will be responsible for many years to come. But I question myself whether the steps that are being adopted will have any great effect in accelerating the payment of taxes, and in any event Liberals will have one consolation in connection with this move. The attempt to squeeze the taxpayer is bound to add enormously to the unpopularity of the Government.

Apropos of some recent remarks in TRUTH upon the recovery of income-tax, a correspondent refers again to the inexcusable delays that frequently occur in dealing with claims for repayment. In his case a claim was sent in last July, and down to the present moment the only answer that he has been able to extract from the Department is that the matter will receive "early attention." The same taxpayer has made an identical claim in previous years, and has received payment in due course, his income being from fixed sources; so that there can be no shadow of reason for the delay, which has now extended over five months. This complaint seems to me to bear directly upon what was said in TRUTH a few weeks ago as to the extravagant expenditure upon the collection of the revenue. If the Board of Inland Revenue were suppressed, and a portion of its pay devoted to supplying a few additional clerks of proper qualifications, claims for the return of income-tax might possibly be dealt with as expeditiously as such matters would be in a private house of business.

BOLIVAR Bolivar Bolivar Bolivar Bolivar Bolivar.

Somebody—it is not for me to say who—deserves to be hauled over the coals pretty roughly on account of the Hooley-Lawson prosecution. Taking into account the protracted proceedings before the magistrate, as well as the twenty-one days' trial at the Old Bailey, the case is one of the longest criminal cases of recent years, and the expense is in proportion. I hear various estimates of the amount that the prosecution must have cost; the lowest is £20,000, and the highest £10,000 more. Whatever the true figure, the money has been worse than thrown away. Giving both defendants the full benefit of the verdict, it is beyond question that a great deal of financial hocus-pocus which it ought not to be possible to carry on with impunity came to light in the course of the proceedings. The effect of the verdict is to advertise to the company-promoting world that this is possible; and such an advertisement can be nothing but mischievous. To prosecute and fail in such a case is worse than not to prosecute at all, apart altogether from the waste of public money.

In the serio-comic libel action of Fournet v Chapman heard last week before Mr. Justice Lawrance, a point was raised by Mr. Bankes, K.C., on behalf of the defendant, which comes to me like a message of hope. After the jury had stopped the case and found a verdict for the defendant, Mr. Bankes asked that the case should be referred under Order 65, Rule 11, to the taxing master to report to the judge whether there had been matters in the initiation and conduct of the case in respect to which the solicitor should be made to pay the costs, and Mr. Justice Lawrance referred the case accordingly. I have not previously heard of Rule 11, but if it is effective in shifting the responsibility for paying the cost of a speculative libel action from the client to the solicitor, it is obviously a most salutary rule, and one which would be warmly welcomed by newspapers which stand to be shot at by any needy adventurer who can find a Dodson and Fogg to act for him.

A tradesman has directed my attention to a report of some recent remarks by Judge Shand at the Liverpool County Court in reference to what is described as "the ticket system of credit." The system is new to me, and the report does not explain it very clearly. It appeared, however, that a pawnbroker and outfitter named George Sturla sued a working man for the value of goods supplied on the authority of a "ticket" signed by the defendant. The "ticket" contained a clause making the signatory liable for all goods obtained upon it from the defendant, and it had been used by the defendant's son and daughter who were both over twenty-one years of age. It was for goods supplied to them that the defendant was sued, but he declared that he never understood that the signing of the document would render him liable for their debts, and though the plaintiff's manager said that he called his attention to the clause at the time, the Judge refused to believe him. In giving judgment for the defendant, his Honour expressed the opinion that "a monstrous injustice was being done by such systems," and certainly a system under which it is sought to make a man responsible for any debts that his family, including grown-up sons and daughters, choose to incur with the tradesman issuing the "ticket" must be open to gross abuse.

A Norwich solicitor calls my attention to the following case of a publican in the village of Acle. In June last the police summoned a woman before the local magistrates for being drunk on the highway, and mainly in consequence of the evidence this publican gave for the defence the charge was dismissed. In July the publican received notice to quit from the owners of his house, Messrs. E. Lacon and Co., brewers, of Great Yarmouth. He learned that complaint had been made by the police, but he was refused any information as to the nature of the complaint. No proceedings had ever been taken against him by the police, though an exceptionally close watch had been kept upon the house after his appearance as a witness against the police in June. In August he discovered that a slanderous statement in regard to his wife was being circulated, and it was alleged that it originated with the village constable. The publican then put the matter into the hands of his solicitor, and the latter had an interview with the superintendent of police, who denied that the slander in question was the ground of the complaint that had been addressed to the brewers. What that complaint was, however, the superintendent declined to say, and the brewers also again declined to give any information.

When the time came for the transfer of the licence the publican's solicitor asked the magistrates to inquire into the matter, but they held that they had no power to do so, and suggested that if the brewers had done any injury to the tenant his remedy was in an action for damages. The suggestion was, of course absurd, because a landlord is not bound to assign any reason for terminating a tenancy, which was all that Messrs. Lacon and Co. had refused to do. The net result of the case is therefore that this man, who had been a licence-holder for years without any charge being openly made against him, is turned out of his house and deprived of his means of livelihood—for it will be practically impossible for him to get another licence—on the strength of a secret report by the police which he has had no opportunity of meeting. It is very necessary that the police should exercise supervision over the conduct of licence-holders, but any complaints that they have to make should be made in open court to the magistrates. That they should be allowed to go behind the publican's back with complaints to the owners of the house—and a brewery company naturally feels bound to heed anything that the police may say—seems a most dangerous and unwarrantable procedure. It places every tenant of licensed premises at the mercy of the force, and whether the complaint in this case was well founded or not, it is obvious that such a system is open to the grossest abuse.

My Legal Pillory this week includes a decision by the Highgate J.P.s in an exceptionally bad case of cruelty to animals. Three horses belonging to the defendant, a dealer named Bertram Tasker, were allowed to starve to death in a field, and other animals of his were found in a shockingly emaciated condition. The fine imposed was a substantial one, but I have pilloried the decision because it seems to me that no pecuniary penalty whatever is an adequate punishment for such callous and systematic cruelty. The proper treatment for an offender of this kind is imprisonment without the option of a fine, and six months' hard labour would not have been a bit too severe a sentence for Mr. Bertram Tasker. There are also several further cases in the following list in which the defendants richly deserved sentences of imprisonment. It is, indeed, a travesty of justice that offenders convicted of gross cruelty or brutal and cowardly assaults should be let off with pecuniary penalties, while terms of imprisonment are inflicted for such crimes as poaching and sleeping out without visible means of subsistence:—

Heanor Petty Sessions. Before Mr. J. J. A. Woolley and other magistrates. Wm. Bestwick, charged with assaulting Samuel Lewis by knocking him down and kicking him. It was an unprovoked assault. Fined £2 6s. 6d., including costs.

Peterborough Police-court. Before Colonel Strong, and Messrs. W. E. Welby, O. Edmunds, J. H. Beeby, G. H. Dean, and W. Cliffe. John Moody, charged with assaulting Joseph Dore. The latter received a wound on the head which laid him up in the infirmary for a fortnight. Fined 40s.

Highgate Police-court. Bertram Tasker, described as a dealer in animals, charged with cruelty by starving and neglecting a number of animals. Three horses belonging to the defendant were found dead in a field, a fourth had to be destroyed, and a cow, two calves, and some pigs were also in a shockingly emaciated condition. Fined £10.

Huddersfield County Police-court. Before Colonel Greenwood, and other magistrates. John Kempston, mill-hand, charged with assaulting his sister. He struck her about the face and tried to strangle her. Fined 21s.

Sheffield West Riding Police-court. Before Messrs. C. Chapman and J. Moxon. Wilfrid Fagan, collier, charged with assaulting his mother and his step-father. Defendant attacked his step-father with a spear, threatening to run it through his heart, and wounding him on the arm. Upon his mother interfering defendant knocked out two of her teeth. Fined 40s. for the first, and 20s. for the second assault.

John Bartholomew, of Wells-next-the-Sea, Norfolk, ought to be devoutly thankful that we have a Great Unpaid to administer justice. Before the Walsingham Bench last week, Bartholomew was charged with stealing a leg of mutton from a butcher's shop. He purchased some pork at the shop, and after his departure the mutton was missed. A policeman interviewed Bartholomew, who invited him to search his house. The invitation was accepted, but when the officer wanted to look into a cupboard Bartholomew refused to let him, saying that the key was lost. He eventually agreed to go back with the policeman to the shop, and on the way he remarked: "I have got the mutton, but I am too fly for you to get it." This conceit was not justified, for in the meantime Bartholomew's house was being watched by another constable, who heard some one go into the back yard and throw something outside. In the mud ten yards from the back door the stolen leg of mutton was afterwards found, and Bartholomew was arrested and charged with the theft. "Yes," he replied, "I took it." This was the gist of the evidence laid before the Walsingham Bench, over whom Mr. F. T. S. Rippingall presided. Some people might think that there was a pretty clear case against Bartholomew. Not so Mr. Rippingall and his colleagues. They dismissed the case, at the same time adding that the police had acted in a perfectly satisfactory manner. I wonder whether the police felt inclined to return the compliment.

Another example of Justices' justice in which the accused assuredly have no reason to complain is reported from Colchester. On the way to the market a horse, described by a veterinary surgeon as very emaciated and in a dropsical condition, fell down several times from weakness and exhaustion, and eventually it was shot in the street. Summonses for cruelty by travelling the animal whilst it was in an unfit state were issued against the farmer to whom it belonged and a youth in his employment. The farmer stated that the horse had been out of his possession at another farm for six weeks, and came back in a terribly poor condition; that he fed it with clover hay for two or three days; and that he then sent it to the market "to be sold to the knackers"! To feed up a horse for the knackers seemed to be an original idea, but, whatever food this animal had had, none could be found in its stomach when it was slaughtered, while, apart from this, it was obviously not in a fit state to travel. Nevertheless the magistrates dismissed the summonses—a decision which suggests that their conception of cruelty to animals differs materially from that of most humane people.

At Bournemouth Police-court last week a journeyman butcher was summoned for refusing to pay a tramway fare. It seemed that he travelled by a workman's car, and tendered the reduced fare payable by workmen on such cars, but the conductor refused to accept it on the ground that he was not a workman, and this view of the matter was upheld by the magistrates, who fined the defendant 10s. Definitions of a workman are almost as varied and unsatisfactory as definitions of a gentleman. Surely, however, it is the height of absurdity to hold that a journeyman butcher is not a workman in such a case as this.

The other day, at Birmingham, two boys named Mason and Walker, the former nine and the latter ten years of age, were caught in the act of stealing a piece of toffee from a confectioner's shop. Mason confessed that they had previously been guilty of several similarly heinous crimes, their plunder from different shops comprising two apples, a bun, a bottle of sweets, and a box of figs, and it was also discovered that Walker had stolen two watches and half a sovereign from his mother's house. A school-attendance officer expressed the opinion that the dexterity and cunning displayed by the lads "would do credit to law-breakers of maturer years;" and on this officer's report, uncorroborated by any other evidence, the stipendiary committed each of the defendants to an industrial school till he is sixteen years of age. This heavy sentence, which was passed in a very off-hand manner, has excited much indignation. It was the first time either of the boys had been before a Court, and the justice of the case would surely have been met by the infliction of a birching and an admonition to their parents to keep them under better control. No juvenile offender should be committed to an industrial school except as a last resort, and children of nine or ten certainly ought not to be treated as incorrigible on the unsupported statement of any school-attendance or police officer.

I have received a number of inquiries of late concerning the Espanola Medicine Company and its wonderful preparation, "Diano," for increasing the size of the bust, from lady correspondents who have missed the previous references to this swindle of Pointing's in the columns of Truth. The "follow-up" letters with which this charlatan pursues the victims of his advertisements are the most humorous of their kind. His real purpose, he explains, is "the betterment of womankind." It is a "matter of wonderment" to him "why women who are fortunate enough to meet with such an opportunity should ignore it, and refuse to accept a woman's most glorious crown,—magnetic, entrancing beauty." He is also anxious on the subject that he has a special "consultation with our medical staff" upon the prospective customer's case. If this sort of nonsense is likely to influence any one, I would commend them to first glance at the Lancet where the definite assertion is made that "no rubbing of grease or taking of 'tonic tablets'" will increase the size of the bust, and the whole business is maintained to be a swindle on a par with the "Antidipso" fraud for the cure of drunkenness.

In another of his multifarious ventures in which, under the alias of "Florence Elliott," Pointing is advertising a course of lessons in the "Grecian System of Physical Culture," I am surprised to find a testimonial dated from 52, Lauderdale-mansions, Maida Vale, W., signed by "(Lady) Caroline Ogilvie-Grant." I cannot find from Kelly that any Lady Ogilvie-Grant resides at the address given, and, according to Dod, the only lady of the name is described as a daughter of the tenth Earl of Seafield, born in 1877. It may be, of course, that the testimonial is a genuine one; but even if it is Lady Caroline Ogilvie-Grant can scarcely be aware that her name is being utilised for advertising purposes by one of the most unprincipled quacks at present preying on the British public.

Meanwhile, in another department of his business Pointing is faced with competition he could hardly have expected. He had appropriated his "Magic Foot-drafts" for rheumatism—remedy, literature, and testimonials—bodily from America, and consequently the arrival of a new "Magic Foot-draft Company" from the United States claiming to possess the one and only real specific must be annoying, to say the least. The new concern is located at 63, Holborn-viaduct, and all the old balderdash about the cure of rheumatism by affixing plasters to the sole of the feet is served up again in the pamphlets and advertisements of the American quacks. With "Kinlo's Foot-drafts" also bidding for popular favour there should be no rheumatism left in the country. I have been asked to advise as to the respective merits of the "Foot-drafts" prepared by these rival firms, but Heaven forbid that I should ever be compelled to arbitrate on the value of these preparations, though I should very much like to see these rival quacks fight out the question amongst themselves.

In consequence of the last reference in Truth to that old-established itinerant quack, "Professor Richard," I have received information showing that the kind of extortion there described is the habitual practice of this disreputable old humbug. His public performances are merely given for the purpose of drawing dupes to his "free" consultations, and when they come to him, though the consultation may be "free," he charges them monstrous sums before giving anything in the nature of advice or treatment. His business is obviously as dishonest as it is mischievous, the worst feature in it being that the victims are, for the most part, very poor people. Like most rogues of the same class in the present day, he owes his success largely to the Press, and the puffing of him in local papers during his recent visit to Southampton is simply scandalous. Provincial journalists owe it to their readers to inform themselves about the man's record before publishing any notice of his performances. If they have not the courage to warn the public against him, they might at least hold their tongues and refuse his advertisements.

The latest application of the snowball to trading purposes is made by a concern at 31, North Frederick-street, Glasgow, called "The Scottish Tobacco Supply Company." The company advertises its desire to give as Christmas-boxes, absolutely free of charge, a box of cigars, cigarettes, or tobacco, together with a cash bonus. The offer is a gratuitous one on the company's part, for it appears that the box of cigars and the cash bonus are both to be provided by the friends of the applicant for the gift. He is simply to sell coupons to such of his friends as may be silly enough to give him sixpence apiece for them, and forward 2s. to the company for a batch of coupons to get rid of in a similar manner. The canny Scot is hardly likely to be victimised by such a stale trick as this, and those possessed of a desire to obtain a merry Christmas at their friends' expense are not to be pitied if their desires end in smoke.

"Heads I win, tails you lose," still appears to be the motto of Charles Kittell, 21, Copthall-avenue, E.C., a betting agent whom I have several times pilloried as a defaulter. In a case just brought under my notice Kittell opened an account with an employee of a West End hotel, giving him a weekly credit of £10. It was agreed that balances of less than £2 should be carried forward, and for the first fortnight this was done, the backer being credited with 17s. 6d. in the first week and debited with £1 2s. 2d. in the second week. By the third week's transactions the backer became entitled to £5 6s 9d., and a cheque for this amount was forwarded by Kittell. At the end of the fourth week the backer had won a further sum of £20 11s. 10d., and a bet on the following Monday increased it to £25 5s. 2d. Not having received a cheque for the £20 11s. 10d., the backer called on the Tuesday at Kittell's office. Kittell himself was not to be seen, but his clerk stated quite frankly that he did not mean to pay, and subsequent applications for the money proved equally unavailing.

Being advised that it would be futile to sue Kittell, as he would plead the Gaming Act, the backer at last informed him that the facts would be communicated to Truth. To this Kittell replied, through his clerk, by threatening to report the backer's betting transactions to the directors of the hotel where he is employed. The clerk who visited the hotel to deliver this message also intimated that if the backer did not take care Kittell himself would come there and kick up "a devil of a row" in the presence of the manager. If Kittell attempts any such performance, the servants of the hotel will be quite capable of dealing with him. Meanwhile, his bluster has not prevented my publication of the story as one more warning to backers against this impudent and unprincipled welsher.

A passing allusion last week to the Midland Referee has brought me a copy of that notorious tipster's sheet in which it says farewell to its readers. Its swan-song is a droll effusion. The gist of it is that the Midland Referee is dying because it has now "reached its zenith" as "the greatest guide ever issued in the interests of the punting fraternity." "Having achieved so much," says the writer, "we propose to rest on our oars and leave others to take up the strenuous struggle at the point where we drop the pen." The article proceeds to descant upon the terror the paper has inspired among "turf sharks," and to refer to the gratifying support it has received from such distinguished personages in the racing world as "Mr. Allsopp," "Mr. Dan Bruce," "Mr. Walter Hooley," "Mr. Percy Macdonald," and "Miss Flossie Beresford." My readers, at any rate, will hardly need to be told that all these names are only aliases of the man Beston, the proprietor of the Midland Referee, and himself the most unprincipled rascal among the touting tipsters. It would be an immense gain to the community which he has duped so long if he really were retiring from his pernicious business. But I fear that, though the Midland Referee may be buried now, it will be resurrected—perhaps under some new title—as soon as the arrival of another flat racing season makes flat-catching once more a profitable game.

A man has been lately going about London calling at private houses, inquiring for the lady of the house, and inviting her to pay the sum of 1s. for the insurance of her keys, etc. The man leaves behind him a printed post-card for the lady to sign in case he does not see her. One paragraph on the card runs as follows:—

> The payment of an annual premium of one shilling will insure your life for £500, fatal accident, or an allowance of £1 per week during disablement, in addition to which your keys, bags, umbrellas, or other property will, if lost with our label attached, be returned to you free of cost (the Company paying a reward of 5s. to the finder), or, in the event of keys being irrecoverably lost, we undertake to replace them to the extent of £8. On receipt of this post-card our label will be forwarded to you by our agent, C. Gray.

The singular part of this document is that the name of the company which makes this liberal offer is undisclosed. The post-card itself is addressed to C. Gray, at 3, Goldsmith-avenue, Acton. On making inquiries after him there, I found that he had moved, and inquiring for him at his new address, I found that he was not at home. As I cannot be under the trouble of hunting him further, I hereby invite Mr. Gray to communicate to me the name of the firm on whose behalf he has been collecting shillings; and pending that information, I should strongly recommend ladies to defer the insurance of their keys through this gentleman's agency.

On several occasions I have referred to a curious business, carried on by means of house to house canvassing, in which the sale of demoralising books is pushed by the offer of trashy "presents" to the purchasers. The business, which is of German origin, was introduced in London by one Eichler, and in the North of England by a so-called "company" established for the purpose at Manchester. What is seemingly another branch of the same concern has now been started by an individual rejoicing in the name of Jentzsch, and describing himself as "publisher and importer," 12, Claypole-road, Nottingham. His agents have been canvassing in Nottingham for subscribers to a sensational story, "printed in Germany" (very badly printed on wretched paper), which is to be completed in 150 twopenny parts. Each part bears a coupon, and when 100 twopences have been paid the subscriber will be entitled to "a musical album," while for 150 he may have a rocking-chair.

It goes without saying that the story and the "present" combined are dear at the price; but the most serious objection to the business arising from the vile character of the books—apparently translations from the German—which are issued in this way. The work now being distributed by Jentzsch in Nottingham was some time ago the subject of some copyright proceedings before Mr. Justice Buckley, who pronounced it to be an obscene publication, and anybody who has glanced at it will endorse his Lordship's opinion. That samples of this disgusting stuff should be thrust through people's letter-boxes for the perusal of servant girls or anybody who picks them up is a scandal, and if the police cannot call Jentzsch to account I should not myself blame any citizen who takes the law into his own hands and horsewhips this publisher and importer of German literary garbage.

Certain warnings have been given in Truth against the advertisements of Scale and Co., of Stockport, "Publishers, Agents, and Mail Order Specialists," and the warning was repeated a fortnight ago in connection with the prosecution in London of a man who had been doing a business similar to that of Scale and Co.—that is to say, obtaining shillings under the pretence of helping people to get berths on steamships, and giving them nothing more for their money than instructions as to the firms or other parties to whom they should address their applications. No doubt the London prosecution has made Mr. Scale a little uncomfortable, and I have consequently been favoured by him with a very bulky communication designed to prove the bona fides of his business. The point of the communication will be seen in the following paragraph:—

> For the last ten or twelve weeks we have over-printed all circulars sent out—although we saw no necessity for doing so—with the words, "it must be distinctly understood that we do not obtain berths." Can anything be more clear? And, in addition to this (as a census), before sending the information, we have forwarded to every sender of remittance during the last few weeks the enclosed circular, asking them if they quite understand the offer we make. Ninety-eight per cent. have answered that they quite understand, including many who say we have insulted their intelligence by asking; and the remainder have had their remittances returned. Does that not show that we endeavour to prevent misunderstanding? Can any advertisers say they have gone so far? During the whole of the time we have offered these instructions and information, we have always written anyone who, from his or her letter, showed they were under the impression that we obtain berths, stating that they were under a wrong impression, and offering to return their remittance if they desired us to do so.

With this letter Mr. Scale forwards the result of his "census" in the shape of an enormous bundle of letters from his customers. As far as I have been able to judge from a cursory inspection, these letters bear out what he says. That is to say, the parties state that they clearly understood what they were paying their money for. That may be so, but it will be noted that this result is clearly due to the fact that since his advertisements were unfavourably noticed in Truth a few months ago, Mr. Scale has thought it desirable to mark all his circulars with a rubber stamp, explaining that he does not offer to obtain berths. That he has thought it desirable to add this notification is a clear admission that the circular in its original form was misleading, and therefore justified my criticism of it. However, Mr. Scale also informs me that he has decided to discontinue this branch of business altogether, and in view of the prosecution now pending in London, he is to be congratulated on this decision. Under these circumstances it is not worth while to discuss the matter further.

The inquiry which has been commenced by the British Medical Journal into the composition of quack medicines should have much more than the merely historical interest to be obtained by placing on record the various popular nostrums in use at the commencement of the twentieth century. The Journal proposes to publish exhaustive analyses of secret remedies which are widely advertised, together with an approximate calculation as to the cost price, and there could be no more useful material for use in a campaign against quackery. The first of the series of articles deals with a number of specifics advertised for the cure of epilepsy, and, as might be supposed, the composition in each case reveals that the ordinary drugs used by every medical man in treatment of the disease form the base of the secret remedy, but that from 2s. 9d. to 4s 6d. is charged for what costs no more than from 1d. to 4d. I shall watch the progress of the Journal's campaign with a good deal of interest, particularly when is comes to deal with the nostrums of the army of quacks whose methods of carrying on their business have been exposed in Truth.

Another instance of the vagaries of Acting-Judge Wilkinson, of the British Court at Bangkok, is reported in a recent issue of the Siam Observer. A young Scotsman in the employ of the Bangkok Dock Company was charged at the instance of a Chinese ex-cashier, formerly in the same employ, with misappropriating £28 belonging to the company. It was a singular feature of the proceedings that the company itself made no charge, the prosecution being instituted solely on the information of the ex-cashier, and without waiting to hear the defence the jury acquitted the accused. One of the witnesses summoned for the prosecution was the manager of the company, but it seemed that he entirely repudiated any charge against the prisoner, and had assisted him in his defence. It came out that with this object the manager had torn a page out of a private memorandum book of his own and handed it to the prisoner.

The page in question, which related to receipts and payments bearing on the case, was duly produced in court; but the Judge took the extraordinary view that in trying to help the defence the manager of the company was tampering with the course of justice, and, after a most portentous lecture on the enormity of his conduct, fined him 100 ticals (about five guineas), and ordered that the amount should be paid to a local nursing home! The legality of the fine—to say nothing of the order that it should be given to an outside institution—is more than doubtful. But even if the Judge did not exceed his powers, the infliction of such a penalty—especially as he finally admitted that the manager "acted innocently"—was an outrageous proceeding, and I would once more commend this eccentric and arbitrary functionary to the attention of the Foreign Office.

The Guernsey Legislature has passed a Bill in regard to alien immigration which puts into the shade anything that has been advocated here. The avowed object of the measure is to check the acquisition of real estate in the island by aliens, not to bring about the exclusion of those who are paupers or criminals. No interference with the latter is proposed, but any moneyed alien wishing to buy or lease real property in Guernsey will have to submit a petition to the Royal Court setting forth "particulars of his social position"—such, for example, as "his family circumstances, his profession, the place whence he came, etc."—and it will be for the Court to decide whether he shall be permitted to become an owner or lessee. I wonder what some of the opulent aliens who settle in Park-lane would say if they were required to furnish particulars of their family circumstances before purchasing a house? The Guernsey Bill seems to be indirectly aimed against the invasion of French religious societies, and, having regard to the limited area of the island, it is perhaps only reasonable that the authorities should have power to prevent too much property falling into the hands of such bodies. But the Bill as it stands is much too drastic and wide-reaching, and the Privy Council will doubtless demand its modification before the King's sanction is given to it.

A very instructive remark fell from Dr. Coole Kneale, the chairman of the meeting which the Chancellor of the Exchequer addressed at Sparkhill last week. Sparkhill is in Mr. Austen Chamberlain's constituency, and, as most people know, there is a gun factory there. After observing that the right hon. gentleman "had not been carried away by the glamour of office, and had not forgotten his constituents," the chairman added:—

> It was thought they were going to have a serious stress during the winter in the gun trade, but they wrote to their member, and they believed that it was almost entirely through him that the gunmakers were now in full work.

The ingenuous chairman does not seem to have realised that in saying this he was casting a serious reflection upon the Chancellor of the Exchequer, for the statement plainly implies that he has used his official influence with the War Office to get public money spent at Sparkhill which otherwise would not have been spent there. Mr. Austen Chamberlain did not deny this soft impeachment; but he did subsequently make some observations which provide a pretty commentary upon his chairman's disclosure. In condemning the proposal that national relief works should be started for the benefit of the unemployed he said:—

> He would not dwell upon the jobbery and corruption to which such a scheme would almost inevitably lead, to the struggle between different localities and rival interests to secure the benefit of the expenditure that was going to be made.

No, Mr. Austen Chamberlain was wise not to dwell on these things.

I do not think that there is the slightest probability of the Colonies ever assenting to pay their share of our naval expenditure, unless we give them, either in meal or in malt, quite as much as their contribution. Our Colonial statesmen are not Jingoes. They very wisely object—as Sir Wilfrid Laurier well put it—to be dragged into the vortex of our militarism. They perceive that the main reason why foreign nations have increased their navies is that we have declared that we must be absolute masters on the high seas, and have proceeded to attain this aim by building more ships. These statesmen are not prepared to take a hand in this game of beggar my neighbour against all foreign nations. When they read the braggart swagger in which Mr. Chamberlain indulges, and remember his habit of bidding defiance to the Universe, they do not think that a cash partnership with a country where he is a leading factor is "good business."

The Colonies gave us help in the Boer War, although they took very good care to throw on us most of the cost of that aid. They now are of opinion that the war ought to have been avoided, and that it was waged, not for the exigencies of Empire, but for the benefit of a horde of greedy cosmopolitan speculators. Chinese slave labour has done much to open their eyes. They protested against it, but their protests have been treated with contempt. This has been an object-lesson to them. They have realised that when we have got their money on the plea of Empire, they will have no voice in the spending of it. If they contribute to the cost of the Navy, they are convinced that this will only lead us to rush into some foolish war, which we may regard as beneficial to us, but which certainly will not benefit them. They regard peace as their most essential interest. There are still too many at home who regard war with favour for them to trust us with their cash, or in any way to help us to fancy that we can bully with impunity.

What specially distinguishes our present Ministers is that they are deaf to all experience. If they make a mistake, they persist in it, for they have neither the manliness nor the honour to acknowledge an error. Every week news comes of some fresh affray between our Chinese chattels and our Kaffirs, or between the chattels and their owners. Ministers were warned that this would be the inevitable result of their folly, but they met the warnings by drawing fancy pictures of the chattels rejoicing in their labour, and cheerfully submitting to the most outrageous restrictions on their freedom. As for the Kaffirs, they told us that they would welcome the chattels, and that Chinese and Kaffirs would be united in the ties of brotherly love. Yet had they not been utterly blind to all probability, they would have known that it was a most dangerous experiment to import Chinese under labour contracts which obliged them to work in certain mines for a pittance, and at the same time subjecting them to conditions that deprived them of the liberty vouchsafed to a pariah dog. It was obvious, too, that the Kaffirs had learnt quite enough of political economy to be aware that Chinese servile labour would keep down their wages.

I have no doubt that things are far worse in the Transvaal than appears by what reaches us, for the Press there is almost entirely in the hands of the mine-owners. But what is known should lead our Government to forbid further importations of Chinese, for the greater the number the greater is the danger. Instead of this, however, the Government boasts that within a few months there will be about 80,000 Chinese chattels in the Transvaal, as though this were an exploit of which to be proud! Further importations ought to be suspended until Parliament is siting, and the question of Chinese chattel labour can be threshed out in the House of Commons by the light of present experience. This, I am afraid, is not likely.

Whether it be because the mine-owners have evidence that Mr. Chamberlain was secretly connected with the Jameson Raid, or because they are large subscribers to the Birmingham Tariff League, or because so many of the ladies and gentlemen who are supporters of the Government have shares in Transvaal mines, or because Ministers are dolts, I expect they will endeavour to introduce more thousands of Chinese into the Transvaal before the verdict of the country is taken, in the hope that a Liberal Government will not restore them to China. In this they will find themselves mistaken, for not only do Liberals believe that the Transvaal will be better without Chinese, but that we are guilty of treason to our best traditions in permitting such slavery to exist under our flag.

The latest official utterance from the Transvaal is that of the Commissioner for Native Affairs. He states that the natives have not since the war been so respectful to Europeans as they were before it, and he recommends a stricter supervision of those likely to imbibe loose and dangerous ideas. Why should a native be respectful to any loafing European who is hanging about in the drinking shops of the Transvaal, or to any of the Randlords who are there to make their fortunes? They should be taught to respect the law and its representatives, but individually they should be no more respectful to a European than a European is to them. The dangerous ideas which it would seem that they are imbibing are that they have a right to have a voice in the amount of wage for which they are prepared to work. This is a view entertained by our own working men, and I see no reason why it should not be shared by our black fellow-citizens, horrible as it seems to their employers.

I certainly am no "Nationalist," as the French crew of snobs, braggarts, fossils, and priests call themselves, who are bent on upsetting the Republic in order to make either the Duke of Orleans a King, or some Bonaparte an Emperor, and I rejoice that the present French Ministry is determined to put an end to all connection between the State and any Church, for I should be glad were an English Ministry to follow the example. But I cannot say that I approve of either employing Freemasons to denounce the politics of officers, and still less of the promotion of officers being made dependent on secret reports of their brother officers—often their subordinates. Such a state of things would never be tolerated here. French officers seem, however, to make a mistake in sending letters to these spies with a view to provoking them to fight duels. They should be cut by their brother officers, and shown the contempt felt for them by leaving them severely alone.

The bloodless duels fought over the blow dealt to General André by a Deputy, and the equally bloodless Jaurès-Déroulède duel, ought to put an end to duelling. M. Jaurès is one of the most able and respected statesmen in France. M. Déroulède is a poet of the Kipling type, bitten with a craze for notoriety, who has been turned out of the country on account of his childish attempts to revolutionise it. To attract attention to himself he wrote an impudent letter to M. Jaurès, informing him that he was a scoundrel for entertaining the political opinions that he holds. M. Jaurès, had he shown his accustomed good sense, would have consigned the letter to his waste-paper basket. Instead of this, he challenged M. Déroulède, and betook himself with seconds and reporters to the Spanish frontier, because the writer of the letter was in Spain.

When the Spanish Government forbade the duel in Spain, M. Jaurès obtained permission for M. Déroulède to cross the frontier in order to fight it out in France. This was done in the presence of an assemblage of reporters and others. The two adversaries were put up at twenty-five paces. Probably they did not aim at each other; in any case, neither was hit, upon which this bloodless duel came to an end. The mind of man can conceive nothing more utterly ridiculous. It would have been a serious loss to France had M. Jaurès been killed, and, although M. Déroulède would be no loss to his country, his case would be better met by a blister being clapped to his neck, and a copious bleeding—if not by transfer to an asylum—than by shooting him. I see no reason why any one should make himself a target for pistol practice at the bidding of any other who chooses to regard himself as offended. But, if duels there are to be, at least they ought not to be the childish farce that a French duel has become.

I know of no reason why we should interpose any difficulties in the way of belligerent nations buying coal in our ports; indeed, for my part, I would allow them without let or hindrance to buy arms, ships, or anything else that they may require for the prosecution of their war, provided always that equal rights in this respect are given to both sides. If we had a monopoly of the articles needed for fighting, there might be a good deal to urge for our refusing to sell them to belligerents. But we have not, and if we do not meet the demand, other countries will, for it must not be forgotten that there is no international obligation to desist from such sales.

Take, for instance, the case of coal. We have that best adapted for steam vessels. If we do not sell, it will be bought by belligerents elsewhere, although perhaps of an inferior quality. The only result, therefore, of our not permitting such sales is that we lose a profitable business and others get it. I would have all contraband of war purchasable in the United Kingdom under all circumstances. It might be shipped in a British vessel or in a vessel of any other nationality from a British port. The vessel would not be liable to seizure whilst in British waters, but if it contained contraband and its destination was a belligerent port, it would remain as now, good prize on the high seas.

Our Foreign Enlistment Act was not framed with a view to hinder purchases by a belligerent. It was passed to prevent sales to people in arms against their Government. Even though we might sympathise with the insurgents, there was reasonable ground for this; they are rebels in arms against the Government that we recognise as that of the country to which the rebels belong. Legally, therefore, they are engaged in a criminal action. So long as we recognise the Government, we are bound by international courtesy not to afford aid and comfort to those engaged in an illegal act towards it. Moreover, the State where the rebellion is going on is not a belligerent; consequently its ships have no right to stop on the high seas British vessels notoriously carrying arms to the rebels.

THE ROBIN AND THE SPARROWS.

Jack Frost had laid upon the Land
The Rigour of his Iron Hand;
And Dicky Birds, in famished Mood,
Prospected, all in Vain, for Food.
'Tis then a Robin boldly comes
Up to a Window (not in Thrums),
And taps upon the Pane for Crumbs.
The Human, on the other Side,
"Oh, see that Darling Robin!" cried,
And ran and fetched, not Crumbs, to eat,
But (better!) Scraps of juicy Meat,
Far more than, if he ate all Day,
One Robin's Tum could put away.
So Bob he pecked up, merrily,
Until a crowded Bob was he,
Then flew and left that Feast Galore,
Awhile, till he had Room for more.
But, while he 's gone, some famished Sparrows,
Raining as thick as Xerxes' Arrows,
Swoop down on where the luscious Fare is,
And start to fill their Little Marys.
The Human saw. "Shoo! cheeky Cadgers!"
He cried. "Be off, you dirty Spadgers.
That Food 's for Bobby, not for you.
Be off, you little Beasts. Shoo! shoo!"
So off the hungry Sparrows flew.
But one, who 's than the Rest more Bold,
Cried: "Bob 's as full as he can hold.
But we—'tis no Exaggeration—
Are dying fast of slow Starvation!"
"Dying?" the Human said. "Don't care;
You shall not touch what 's Robin's Fare."
"But Bob 's as full as Full can be!"
"Why, that 's just it," the Man, said he,
"It 's always been my Practice steady,
To feed the Birds who're full already."

Their wealthy Friends who Food don't need,
Yet never think to feed the Poor
Who starve in Thousands at their Door!

SCRUTATOR.

A CASE OF "OBSESSION."

THERE are a vast number of lunatics who are sane upon most matters. Their insanity consists in some one particular delusion. In regard to this they are incapable of weighing evidence. The delusion is part and parcel of themselves, and generally arises from some one nerve centre in the brain having got the mastery over all others. Some of these people are shut up in asylums, others are left free because their particular illusion is not dangerous to others. When once the illusion has commenced it perpetually acquires strength. Everything which would seem likely to dispel it only confirms it. Generally the origin of these delusions is exaggerated self-esteem. At first it is a mere passing opinion, but the afflicted person is so certain that he knows better than others that he is unable to conceive that he can be wrong. This, I take it, is the source of Mr. Chamberlain's Protectionist craze. He wanted some subject to keep himself well before the public. It occurred to him that this end might be effected by preaching an economic revolution. What, he thought, would be more startling than to declare himself a convert to Protection? Here we have the origin of the idea which has now mastered him. Soon he found arguments which he deemed plausible in favour of his sensational scheme. The delusion was encouraged, and the normal working of the brain thrown out of gear. He became a convert to Protection himself, and assured everybody he met that the doctrine must be sound because he believed that it was. In no other way can it be supposed, consistently with general sanity, that he would have told his countrymen to renounce Free Trade, because he pledged his word that they would all be ruined if they did not. Soon facts only were reflected on his brain in a distorted fashion. He made assertions which were notoriously incorrect. Two and two soon became either three or five as it suited his delusion. On other matters he probably can reason like any other sane individual. On all connected with his delusion he is quite crazy. Bread, according to him, at one moment will be dearer under Protection, at another minute it will be cheaper. When it is to be dearer, he explains that food generally will be cheaper, because tea or sugar will be cheaper, and bacon will remain at present quotations. The Colonists will separate from us, he asserts, if we do not tax our food for their benefit. When they indignantly deny this, he replies that he knows it, if they do not. What seems proof positive that Protection will ruin us, he assures us proves precisely the reverse. His friends ought really to induce him to live in retirement, and they should carefully avoid all reference to his delusion. This is the only chance of his cure. As it is, he will go from bad to worse, continually fall a prey to fresh delusions, and very possibly end miserably.

These were the reflections that suggested themselves to me on reading Mr. Chamberlain's speech at Limehouse last week. At the outset it appeared as if his mind were wandering, for his exordium took the form of an essay on good manners. Mr. F. C. Gould has, I fancy, depicted him in the character of Turveydrop, but assuredly no one who takes him seriously would ever have gone to him for instruction in correctness of deportment or good taste in public life. Still less will they do so after his performance at Limehouse, for, after complaining that personalities should be infused into the fiscal controversy, he proceeded to exhort Sir Henry Campbell-Bannerman to try to be a gentleman, if he could not be a patriot; and at a later stage he described Lord Rosebery as a combination of gas and water. Either this début as a professor of good manners indicates the advent of some fresh delusion, or the atmosphere of the East End must have thrown the good Turveydrop off his balance.

In the main, however, the speech merely indicated the persistency of the old aberration, in spite of all the corrective treatment of fact and argument. The guests at the "Edinburgh Castle" were informed, just as others have been under the like circumstances, that Free Trade is a doctrine sixty years old, conceived in circumstances which are altogether different from those in which we live; that, one by one, every civilised State has rejected it; that we alone are found adhering to "this old superstition." In what way the circumstances of the present day differ from those of sixty years ago the audience were not informed. Had they been, they might have been struck by the fact that though the circumstances have changed so much, the arguments against Free Trade show no sign of change, and that the Protectionists of to-day are saying precisely the same things as their predecessors who fought against Cobden. It is certainly strange that if the times change so much they bring to light no new arguments in favour of Protection. Equally reticent was the preacher as to the names of the civilised nations which have one by one rejected Free Trade, "one by one found it wanting." The history of those nations as hitherto written contains no record of this conversion to Free Trade and subsequent relapse, no record of the trials of the system which has finally been "found wanting" and abandoned. But it is the characteristic of gentlemen in Mr. Chamberlain's unfortunate condition of mind that historical facts have no existence for them. The one historical fact which concerns us, of course, is that we have tried Protection—tried it far longer than we have tried Free Trade—and found it most unmistakably wanting, on which ground we gave it up, very wisely; and, to put it on the lowest ground, we never prospered before as we have done since. If other nations had made a similar experiment with different results, that would not prove that we were wrong, but as a matter of fact, they never have—not, at any rate, the nations from whom Mr. Chamberlain bids us learn. The most alarming thing of all is that, after all the experience that we have had, the unfortunate gentleman should attempt to convince us that he is proposing something new, and should waste his breath in inveighing against Free Trade as an "old superstition"—sixty years old. Think of that! There must have been, one would suppose, a sprinkling of people among the audience with sufficient education to know that Free Trade is a mere baby in arms beside Protection—if anything, nearer 600 years old than 60. It must have been very painful to them to see this evidence of the speaker's afflicted condition.

It seems to have been the same all through the speech. In almost the next passage Mr. Chamberlain enlarged on the way that British industry is handicapped by the tenderness of our legislation for the interests of labour. If foreign goods enter our markets on equal terms with our own, "trade will go to those foreign countries which are not hampered by any of these humanitarian considerations." What are these foreign countries? Possibly Italy, Austria, or Russia, who have not hitherto been used as bogeys by the Tariff Reformers, but hardly the United States, where labour legislation is rapidly becoming as strict as with us, and certainly not Germany, where it is in many vital matters stricter. The two chief competitors before whom the Tariff Reformer quakes are not materially behind us in "humanitarian considerations." Poor Mr. Chamberlain must have studied the labour legislation of those countries, or he would not speak as he does. Yet it will be seen that his mind is a blank as to all that he has learned. So it was when he went on to speak of the relation of protective tariffs to "unemployment." Over and over again it has been shown by authentic figures—to say nothing of the facts which every traveller can see for himself—that there are as many unemployed workers in France and Germany as there are in England—indeed, many more—and far less regularity in the general rate of employment. But still the victim of these obstinate delusions can get up before a working-class audience and promise them boldly that if they will only let him tax them "scientifically," as working men are taxed in France or Germany, Italy or Russia, there will be no more unemployed workmen in our streets.

One might go on like this almost indefinitely, tracing the idée fixe through its various stages and developments, for the speech lasted two full hours, and fills over five columns in the Times, which shows, at any rate, that the patient's physical powers remain, most happily, unimpaired. But I think the public are getting a little tired of these sad exhibitions, and I know that I am. Until a recent date, I wondered how the audiences were got together on these occasions. The wonder was removed by the publication the other day of the circulars that are being delivered in preparation for the Chamberlain meeting at Gainsborough. The local agents for the show write to farmers or others in the adjacent regions explaining that they want "bonâ-fide working men" to form an audience. The recipient of the communication is invited to say whether he can undertake to deliver such articles, just as if he were a contractor invited to supply any form of merchandise. He is not asked to quote a price, but he is told that if he can execute the order "a special reserved seat" will be kept for him. Attached is a form of tender, on which the contractor is to state particulars of the size of the consignment, the most convenient railway station for delivery, and whether he will undertake to pay carriage, and, if so, how far. This is all beautifully businesslike, but it hardly speaks well for the spontaneity of the demonstration in favour of tariff reform to which Gainsborough will treat the world on February 1. Not to put too fine a point on it, it shows in the most convincing manner that the whole "crusade," as the great man again called it last week, is a piece of elaborate "fake." One wonders how many of the "bonâ-fide working men" who filled the Edinburgh Castle last week were got together by similar means. According to the newspapers, a goodly number of the "bonâ-fide" arrived in broughams or motor-cars. It would be interesting to know whether the carriage was paid by the contractor in these cases or by the consignees. To do Mr. Chamberlain justice, there is no sign of any failing of his powers in one direction. He is still, as of old, a pastmaster of all the arts of the political "boss." If the country can be "bluffed" into swallowing his fiscal propaganda, "bluffed" it assuredly will be. Up to the present, however, not much progress seems to have been made in that direction. The "bonâ-fide working man" has demonstrated at the polls somewhat differently from the bonâ-fide deadheads delivered by contract at Chamberlain meetings. The "boss" declared at Limehouse that he cares not how soon a general election takes place, and referred to the programme upon which he—though ostensibly only a private member of Parliament—will ask the country to vote on that occasion. Here we have something, at any rate, that can be put to the test. If Mr. Chamberlain sincerely desires a dissolution, he has the power in Parliament to bring it about, and the opportunity of using it can soon be found when Parliament meets. Will he be as good as his word, or will the event show that his anxiety to put his programme before the country is only one more bit of bluff? Time will very soon show.

NELSONS AND THEIR CUSTOMERS.

The action which is to decide the rights of Nelson and Co.'s customers and pensioners in the situation into which the pension tea business has now drifted, is now under way, and the first skirmish took place on Friday last before Mr. Justice Swinfen-Eady in the Chancery Division. As the action now stands, an express allegation of fraud is made against the company. The whole issue, therefore, is raised in a very satisfactory manner. Beyond this it is, of course, improper to make any reference to the proceedings. I am, however, receiving inquiries from all quarters as to whether it is desirable that, pending the decision of this action, the 700,000 customers of Nelson and Company should continue to purchase their tea. The question is of so much importance to so many women, most of them very poor and ignorant, that I feel bound to give my opinion upon it. The following letter, which I received last week, gives a very good indication of the sort of circumstances under which this question presents itself:—

> As a constant reader of your paper I have been greatly interested in your Nelson Pension Tea articles. Would you recommend a woman, who is "one of the 700,000," to continue to buy the tea for the next few weeks, in order that she may participate in any bona-fide scheme of restitution such as which you suggest to Mr. Emerson Bainbridge? The case of this woman is very distressing. I found the family two years ago on the verge of starvation, through no fault of their own. The husband was an old soldier, had fought at Majuba and in the Egyptian campaign, and some three years ago fell from a crane seventy feet high. He was terribly injured, and after a year in London hospitals was sent here to his native place. I was able to obtain a little light work for him this summer, but he thinks himself most fortunate if he earns 2s. a week. The wife works very hard as a charwoman, but the most she ever earns is 12s. weekly, and sometimes she has no work for weeks. The family then have to subsist on 7s., which the eldest son earns as an errand boy. . . . The mother pays weekly into a Provident Dispensary Club for them all, but never will she miss buying her half pound of Nelson tea. It has been impossible to dissuade her from this, though the money would be so much better invested in milk. I think you will agree with me that there are few cases in which the pension tea has proved more pernicious than this. Every penny is of the utmost importance to this family, and yet they are contributing their mite to swell the Nelson dividends, with, so far as I can see, little prospect of getting any return for their money. I do not think that the poor woman is ever likely to be left a widow, for her husband seems to improve in health; and I think that I could now persuade her to give up buying the tea, unless, in your opinion, it would be wiser for her to continue a customer until the whole affair is wound up.

It is pitiful to think of the number of people that there must be in more or less similar circumstances among the 700,000 Nelson customers. The Widows' Pension Protection Society, to which I referred last week, has issued a post-card, the first paragraph of which runs as follows:—

> Customers of Nelson and Co., Ltd., are strongly advised not to discontinue taking tea for the present, as by so doing they may lose any rights they have, or may have, against the company.

I presume that this advice, meaning so much as it does to an immense number of working-class women, has not been given without some legal authority; but I confess I do not at present understand what legal rights the 700,000 customers—except, of course, those who are already widows—have, or "can" have until their husbands die, against the company. There may be a question as to their rights against the £20,000 Government deposit, which it is now proposed to charge in favour of the new life insurances of the Nelson Trading Company. But these rights will, I presume, be effectually determined in the interests of all concerned in the action now pending; and, what is of more importance, these rights can never be of any tangible value to any customer until she becomes a widow, because until that event she has no legal claim on the company. Moreover, even among the widows, already 19,000 in number, £20,000 is worth very little. As regards the rest, if it were divided up to-morrow among the whole 700,000 it would only give to each of them about the extra cost of her tea for one week.

For these reasons I fail utterly to see what rights any woman not already a widow has, or can have against the company which would make it worth her while to go on buying the tea under the present conditions for a single week. The only motive for doing so would be that indicated by the writer of the above letter, viz., that the women might thereby participate in some "bonâ-fide scheme of restitution." I cannot think, however, that if any such restitution were made, whether by Mr. Emerson Bainbridge or any one else, any woman would be excluded from it on the ground that she had discontinued taking her tea under the circumstances that have now arisen—that is to say, in view of the reduction of the widows' pensions by one-half. "A bonâ-fide scheme of restitution" implies that some of the profits that have been made out of all these unfortunate women would be handed back to them by the gentlemen into whose pockets they have gone, and such a scheme, if it is to have any show of equity about it, must embrace at least all those who have been paying their contributions up to the date of the reduction of the pensions. If Mr. Emerson Bainbridge, or any other of those gentlemen, should feel it their duty to take this course, it must be assumed, therefore, that they will allow all those women to participate.

I see, therefore, no reason for recommending any woman, not already a widow, to continue her payments under the present circumstances, whether in the hope of participating in some hypothetical restitution scheme or in any other expectation. The one expectation in which all payments have hitherto been made is that of receiving a pension on widowhood to the amount held out in the company's advertisements. That expectation is delusive, as the facts have already shown, and there is nothing in the present position of the pension fund to lead women to expect they ever will receive such pensions, or will even receive pensions of a reduced amount for any length of time. For a year and a half past I have been warning women against paying to the pension fund, and certainly nothing that has happened during the last few weeks suggests that those warnings were unfounded, or should now be withdrawn. At any rate, if any customer, not at present a widow, feels any doubt on this point, she should fortify herself with legal advice; and when the Widows' Pension Protection Association takes the step of advising all the customers to continue their payments for the present—a course which appears to be for the benefit of the company before everybody else—I think it ought to explain clearly and definitely on what grounds, or on what authority, it gives this advice.

As regards the existing widows, the position may be slightly different. By the terms of their contract they are entitled to their pensions as long as they continue purchasing their weekly packet of tea; and as they are clearly getting some value for their money as long as they are receiving pensions of more than 6d. a week, it is clearly to their interest to go on buying their tea as long as the company is in the position to pay that amount. The case of the existing widows, however, though their disappointment on the reduction of their pensions may be great, and will be still greater when, as is bound to happen, the pensions finally cease altogether, is not the most serious part of the present situation, for, as was pointed out in Truth only last week, all widows who have been paid their pensions in full for a few months, and many who have only been paid for a few weeks, have already received back as much as they paid into the pension fund. They therefore stand to lose nothing beyond the frustration of the hopes which they had been led to form. The greatest grievance against the pension scheme is that of the women who have been paying their money for any period up to the seven years that the scheme has been in operation, and who now discover that they have no prospect of ever getting the pension for which they have been paying. The grievance is perhaps worst in the case of those women—though I do not know how many of them there are—who have joined the fund as widows, on the promise that they will receive pensions after buying their tea regularly for ten years. It would be absurd to suggest that any of these women should go on paying on such conditions merely to enable the widows who have already got their money back to obtain additional payment from the company; and the company has certainly no right to ask them to do so, whether on this or any other ground; all the less so, since, by the inevitable operation of the scheme as it stands, the continuation of customers' payments brings far more profits to a handful of shareholders than it even brings to the 19,000 widows. In short, the scheme being what it is, and the financial situation being what it is, there is only one equitable solution of the difficulty—namely, to wind up the scheme at the earliest possible moment.

I credit the existing board, or, at any rate, the majority of them, with a desire to do the right thing. I understand that their only wish is to get rid of the pension scheme, and to substitute for it an honest and businesslike scheme of life insurance. If that is so they can have no desire that the 680,000 deluded customers who have not yet become entitled to pensions should go on paying their weekly money to the company under the vain delusion that they are making provision against widowhood. On that view of the matter there is one very practical suggestion that I would make it to the board. It is this, that now that the pensions have been reduced to half the amount originally held out, the purchase of tea required of customers should be reduced in proportion. This applies equally to the existing widows and to the customers who have not yet reached that condition, but more especially to the latter. If a woman has been promised 10s. a week on widowhood for so many purchases of ½ lb. of tea, now that the pensions have dropped to 5s., she ought not to be asked to buy more than ¼ lb.; while the woman who has been asked to buy ¼ lb., by the offer of a 5s. pension, should now be allowed to buy 2 oz. for a 2s. 6d. pension. One effect of this would be that the profits would be proportionately reduced, the pensions would be further reduced with them, and the final extinction of the scheme, which it must be the desire of every honest director to bring about, will be to that extent expedited. It has more than once been pointed out to me when discussing the pension scheme with the representatives of the company, that the directors are powerless to suspend payment, or to reduce pensions as long as the scheme continues to run at a profit. While the profits are there, they must continue to divide them pro ratâ. So they have been advised by eminent counsel, and I dare say that eminent counsel are right. But what it seems necessary to point out to the board is that it is a very simple matter for them, by letting the profits go, to get out of this difficulty. It is no use beating about the bush in this matter. The majority of the directors know as well as I do that the pension scheme is indefensible. With the possible exception of Mr. Morris Catton, I do not believe there is a man among them who would stand up in public to-day and attempt to justify it. The most they will attempt to say for themselves is that the promoter and the original directors have set the thing going, and that the present board cannot get out of it, though they hope to do so in time. I say emphatically that this is all humbug. The only persons who are interested in the survival of this scheme for another week are (1) the shareholders in Nelson and Co. —that is to say, principally Mr. Emerson Bainbridge and Mr. Catton, (2) the parties interested in the sale of tea—again Mr. Emerson Bainbridge and Mr. Catton —and (3) the 19,000 widows, who have already for the most part got back the money they paid in, if not more. The question is, what right these parties have to expect the remaining 680,000 customers to go on with their weekly payments in the present circumstances of the company for their benefit. I say, No right whatever. It is the duty of the board to hasten the dissolution of the scheme by every means in their power. It is idle to say that this is impossible. I have indicated above one method, and a very equitable one, by which it might be done; and others might be found if there were any desire to do so. It is only the interests of those concerned in the profits that stands in the way. If the board can build up on the wreck of the pension scheme a new business by means of their new insurance scheme, they have every right to do so, and I wish them success. But beyond that they have no right to continue the old business of Nelson and Co. for a day longer; and I trust that customers will not be misled by anybody into assisting them to do so.

HINTS ON CHRISTMAS APPEALS.

So far as I can judge from my own private letter-box, the number of charitable appeals sent out indiscriminately at this season of the year increases at an alarming ratio. Not only great institutions like the leading Metropolitan hospitals, with incomes running into five figures, but the most insignificant local charities, with subscription lists of a few hundreds a year, seem now to think it their duty to post thousands of circulars during the first two or three weeks in December, mostly to people who have never heard of them, and are not in the least likely to take any interest in them; and the flood of urgent petitions for aid is swollen by the efforts of individual mendicants of all sorts and conditions. This growing practice is a serious evil, for many reasons. It implies, in the first place, a lamentable waste of money, for it is difficult to believe that one in five hundred of the supplications elicits a practical response, and the greater portion of them go unread behind the fire. It also has the effect of hardening the hearts of those who are not too charitably disposed, for a man is apt to get annoyed after opening two or three envelopes all telling the same story, and begins to toss them aside as soon as he perceives their nature; while even those who may be on the look-out for deserving objects of charity are bewildered by the multitude of applicants, and, in the difficulty of making a choice, end by giving to none.

One consequence of this state of things is that at this season of the year I am myself inundated with requests for advice about Christmas appeals. This is flattering, no doubt, but I am not exactly an expert in these matters, and that so many people should ask the assistance of a mere humble journalist in deciding how they shall give their alms at Christmas time, shows very clearly the embarrassment produced by the present system of begging by post. I have a very strong feeling myself that the mere giving away of money, because one party says he wants it, or another party recommends the case as a deserving one, has very little to do with charity in the proper sense of the word. My notion is that the truly charitable person should find out the needs of others for himself, and that his almsgiving should only be one part of the exercise of personal sympathy and care for the suffering and the needy. I am sure, at any rate, that it is the restriction of charity to the mere writing of cheques that leads to all the abuses of charity—and they are many—that I ever came across. It is only the man or woman who conceives charity to mean parting with money, and nothing more, who is likely to be imposed upon. However, the person who writes to the Editor of Truth before drawing his, or her, cheque, is a degree in advance of the person who draws and despatches it without any inquiry at all, and on this principle, when my advice is so extensively invoked, I cannot refuse to give it, within certain limits.

As regards one class of appeals—those emanating from individual mendicants—my advice is always being given; and during the last few weeks a great many inquiries that fall under this head have been given in the columns of Truth. It is not necessary, therefore, to deal with any specific appellants here. All I will offer on this point is the general observation that no one should ever give to a stranger who begs of him by post without independent information about the merits of the case. I believe it is safe to say, as a general rule, that such appeals are not even worth the trouble of inquiring into. Inquire, if you like; but, at any rate, do not give without inquiry. There is no question about the harm done by promiscuous alms-giving in this case. Much the same thing may be said of the large class of people who disguise their begging by offering articles for sale—from book-markers and babies' socks to oil-paintings. Nearly all such mendicants are mere traders, who use appeals to benevolence as a means of pushing their goods; and not a few of them are impostors of the most undeserving class. The files of Truth contain the records of any number of them.

Another general observation which I find it necessary to repeat, is that nothing but harm is done by supporting obscure charitable agencies which publish no accounts; and I would urge those who may be tempted by moving reports and appeals to give to such concerns not only to ascertain that accounts are published, but to study them intelligently, to see that they are vouched for by chartered accountants, and to satisfy themselves that no undue proportion of the money subscribed is spent on costs of collection and on the salaries of managers and officials. If there is the slightest room for doubt on these points, shun the thing like the plague—especially where a doubtful-looking financial account is bolstered up by sensational accounts of the good work done, and hysterical appeals to the sympathies of the benevolent. These are the signs by which you may know the most audacious and the most mischievous forms of dishonest charity-mongering. Beware, too, of all "reverend" gentlemen, in clerical garb, who run quasi-religious "missions" of unknown denomination, or no denomination at all, especially if they knock at the door in person. They are the most abandoned of all their class. Be not deceived even if one should bear the title of a "Bishop," and the apron and gaiters too. I believe that only one has got as far as that, but he is as bad as any of them.

All this is, of course, negative advice, and many of my readers ask for suggestions as to the directions in which they can give their money to the best advantage. To attempt to answer this places me at once in a difficulty. I cannot pretend to judge between the respective merits of the scores of useful charities that are crying for help at the present moment; and to make out a list of even the most deserving would only place the reader in the same position as he is in when he receives a dozen postal appeals in the course of a day. He probably has no intention of giving to all, and he will have no means of discriminating between them. The most that I can attempt to do is to enumerate a few which I know something about personally, or the claims of which have been specially brought before me. As regards the London hospitals, which make, of course, by far the largest appeal to the benevolence of the public at this time of year, I would point out two things: First, that anybody who takes an interest in hospital work which goes beyond the drawing of a cheque, can easily find out by personal visits or inquiries the merits of the smaller institutions in his own neighbourhood, which he feels to have special claims upon him; secondly, that where this is impossible, by far the best way of supporting London hospitals is to subscribe to one or other of the great central funds, the Hospital Sunday Fund, or King Edward's Hospital Fund for London, with its auxiliary the League of Mercy, which can be relied upon as discreet and economical almoners of charity in this shape. Further, if any doubt is felt about the merits of any particular institution, an inquiry of the Charity Organisation Society, or the Editor of Truth, will always set it at rest. I might also refer to the special Christmas Supplement published in the Hospital of December 10, where the needs of all the principal hospitals are very carefully set out, and it may be taken for granted that no institution is mentioned there which is not well worthy of support. If my personal recommendation is good for anything, I might specify particularly the King's College Hospital Rebuilding Fund, the object of which is to re-erect this important general hospital on a site in South London, where it is urgently needed; the National Hospital for the Paralysed and Epileptic (Queen-square, Bloomsbury), which is about to close its valuable Convalescent Home for want of funds to maintain it; and the various children's hospitals, scattered about London, more particularly the admirable Hospital for Sick Children in Great Ormond-street, the smaller Paddington Green Children's Hospital, and the Alexandra Hospital for Children with Hip Disease (Queen-square, Bloomsbury). I am afraid to enlarge the list, but I have been specially asked to call the attention of my readers to the pressing needs of the Charing Cross Hospital, which has been involved of late in an enormous expenditure for necessary improvements, which are at present very far from paid for.

As regards charities of a different nature, beyond the general hints given above, I cannot attempt to do more than specify two or three institutions of which I know something personally. To recommend even representative agencies of every different class would defeat the object in view. I should like to say a word, in the first place, on behalf of the Poor Clergy Relief Corporation (38, Tavistock-place, W.C.). I place this in the forefront of those agencies which come to the relief of distressed gentlefolks—the class which feels poverty the most acutely, and is the very last to beg for itself. Everybody in these days must have heard something of the dire straits of many of the clergy of the Church of England, especially those holding country benefices on starvation stipends; at any rate, if anybody needs information as to the extent of their poverty—to say nothing of the needs of widows and orphans—the Secretary of the Poor Clergy Relief Corporation can give him enough and to spare. While the emoluments of the Church of England are distributed as they are, it seems to me to be the duty of every Churchman and Churchwoman to support this charity, and I hope that it will not be forgotten at Christmas time. Among general charities for the benefit of people in "reduced circumstances," I may mention the United Kingdom Beneficent Association (7, Arundel-street, W.C.), which disburses annually large sums in annuities, and could well do with more. Among those which provide homes for the poor, one of the best, I believe, is the Homes for the Aged Poor (Hon. Secretary, Miss Harrison, 86, Penge-road, S.E.). This society has now fifteen houses in different parts of London, where old people of satisfactory antecedents, who are provided from any source with enough money for food and clothing, are provided with quarters rent free, and with medical attendance when necessary. But for this help the whole of them—including a number of married couples—would now be in the workhouse; and it is a kind of charity that might well be extended. On no account, however, let this institution be confounded with the South London Homes for Aged Deserving Poor, conducted by one Sergant in Kennington-road, S.E.—a very different thing indeed. As the young are too often in want of homes as well as the aged, I will also mention that I take an interest in a little institution called St. Michael's Orphanage, the address of which is Grafton House, Beavor-lane, Hammersmith. There are forty little orphans in it now—the youngest a seven-months-old baby—and the Mother Superior tells me that she is in sore straits to provide for them. This is an Anglican institution, and does not advertise or appeal to the public in a general way, which gives me the more confidence in mentioning its needs. Another children's charity for which I am asked to say a word is the Children's Dinner Fund of the London Vegetarian Association (Memorial Hall, Farringdon-street). It has given over 330,000 meals to the poorest of the poor up to the present time, and that seems to me a form of Vegetarian propaganda which a man might support without scruple, even though he himself eats nothing but roast beef and turkey at Christmas.

I was asked the other day by a good lady who gives away a great deal of money to tell her how she could reach the poorest of the poor at Christmas time. Perhaps the answer I gave her may be found useful to others. I told her that she had better get into communication with the Sisters of Nazareth, at Nazareth House, Hammersmith, or the Little Sisters of the Poor, whose address is all over the world, but who may be found in London at St. Joseph's House, Portobello-road, W., St. Ann's House, Manor-road, Stoke Newington, and many other equally unfashionable neighbourhoods. "But," said the good lady to whom I gave this information, and who had evidently read her TRUTH attentively, "they are Romanists, and they publish no accounts." I answered that this is one of those exceptions that prove the rule. It seems to me that these good Sisters give a sufficient account of their stewardships in their works. There is no question here of snug managers and officials, living with large families in comfortable houses on the charity they dispense; no question of heavy commissions to collectors, or other management expenses, absorbing a huge percentage of the funds collected. The Sisters themselves live in the meagrest fashion, little better fed or clothed than the poor for whom they work. What they receive they give without taking toll of it. In the case of the Sisters of Nazareth, they not only give, but they work like slaves among the poor. They nurse them in sickness, they wash and dress the children, they go down on their knees, and scrub the floors. They go round with their vans and collect the broken meats—the crumbs that fall from the rich man's table—at hotels, and restaurants, and any big houses that will supply them—the Houses of Parliament among the rest. They sort it and dish it up with their own hands, and feed with it the sick and the hungry. The Little Sisters of the Poor support some 30,000 old men and women in their homes in different parts of the world, and, what is more, they ask no questions about the religion of those to whom they minister. The Sisters of Nazareth have about 600 of the same class in their home at Hammersmith, which the Charity Organisation Society, after inspection, reports to be "very clean, airy, and well-kept, with excellent bathrooms and lavatories." I do not thing that any one who sees these Sisters at work, and knows how they live, remembering, too, that they are subject to visitation and inspection from the heads of their own Church, will want to see any accounts. For my part, when I see any Protestant or other denominational agency at work on the same lines, I will cheerfully grant it a dispensation from the chartered accountant. As to the Sisters being Romanists, I felt disposed to tell my lady friend, in the words of the Apostle, that though she bestowed all her goods to feed the poor, she had not charity. I refrained, however, and told her instead that she had better look out among those of her own denomination for the clergy and the district visitors, and the other devoted people who are face to face with the poor and suffering every day, and give her help to them. They are not difficult to find in any London parish, though they may not blow their own trumpets very loudly; nor are they confined to any particular denomination. Charity and denominationalism have, indeed, precious little to do with one another; and that is not the least important of the hints that I venture to offer on the subject of Christmas appeals.

THE THEATRES.

"Lady Madcap" at the Prince of Wales's.

Musical comedy may not inaptly be defined as a courtship which rarely ends in matrimony. As a rule, the librettist and the composer are not really well suited to one another, and their association turns out to be nothing better than a liaison, broken off at the box or registry office draped in mourning. Here, exceptionally, I am glad to welcome a happy ending to a courtship of the kind. For the light and graceful muse of Mr. Paul Rubens has found in the witty, observant, and humorous libretto of Colonel Newnham-Davis a partner round whom the floating draperies of harmony and of melody can twine and gyrate in all their native grace, a manly, sure support. The marriage was celebrated on Saturday evening, and the company who attended it constitute an essential part of its success.

To abandon the figure with which I have commenced this article is not to abandon the flowery paths of flirtation and of matrimony, for the doings of that exquisite and amiable little madcap, Lady Betty Claridge, are all of them bound up with affairs of the heart. Others will have furnished the full details of her proceedings; here I will but attempt to make a nosegay from her lapful of flowers.

All the multifarious doings of the Lady Betty and of her maid, and of her friend, Gwenny Holden, prior to the departure of her severe father, Lord Framlingham, on his wild-goose flight to London, so artfully arranged by his daughter, are aglitter with bright sayings and humorous situations; and when that Laconian parent and his portentous butler, who follows him with a goose-quilled telegram, are out of the way, how merry are the doings in Egbert Castle! Pretty unrepentant Lady Betty peeps from the window of her bedroom, and ere long reappears, deliciously travestied as her own maid, in short skirt and tenuous lace apron. She has much to attend to, for although (as she puts it) she has only invited "one regiment," yet that regiment contains the maker of a hundred runs, Trooper Smith (with a "y" as the inimitable G. P. Huntley keeps drawlingly explaining). Trooper Smith is the man she loves, and Trooper Smith is really no trooper, but the millionaire, Oroya Brown. Then Lady Betty has also invited, for Gwenny's sake, the Count de St. Hubert, a marvellous Frenchman in pale grey, a melodiously marvellous Maurice Farkoa. Then there are the two gentlemen of industry, namely, Stony Stratford and his accomplice, Posh, who have come to Egbert Castle in reply to Lady Betty's advertisement for a millionaire husband. Here are sufficient complications to fill the small white hands of her ladyship, but there are others, and yet those little hands continue to hold them all, and the fates unravel the twisted skein, delightfully.

I have said that the witnesses of the marriage ceremony of the libretto and of the music are an essential part of its success, and I will briefly indicate some of them. First of all stands Mr. G. P. Huntley, who has returned from Transatlantic wanderings to gladden our hearts. As Trooper Smith the librettist has provided him with a part which suits him down to the ground, like those strange trousers he wears when, discarding the uniform of the trooper, he descends to the cellar to "buttle" at her winsome lady's-maidship's command. The happy conjunction of Mr. Aubrey Fitzgerald's unique temperament and Colonel Newnham-Davis's witty dialogue, make of Stony Stratford's impersonation (a word which covers the whole of his doings both as actor and character in the play) a feast of laughter. His confederate, Posh Jenkins, with his coster's strut and absurd impromptus, finds in Mr. Fred Emney an excellent exponent. Of the purely military element, much can be said; I say little, but in saying that Mr. Leedham Bantock did very well as the somnolent colonel with the pretty flirtatious wife, I have yet said much. His song, "The Beetle and the Boot," with its accompaniment of gathered skirts and shrill screams from its fair auditors, was perhaps the triumph of the musically absurd on Saturday evening. Lord Framlingham's butler (the real one) found in Mr. R. St. George a very humorous exponent of the fussy old family servant.

Of the ladies, taken en masse, with their background of chorus in lavender dresses, and the tiny "flappers" who have their chance so well taken in their sweetly chirped song with their titanic footmen lovers, I cannot speak too favourably. They are excellently well chosen, and among the former stands out first Miss Adrienne Augarde in the title-rôle, on whom the success of the piece rested. Her little shoulders were well able to support it, and, alike in her well-played comedy scenes, in her singing, and in her girlish buoyancy, it is easy to recognise the rising star. Elegance, beauty, voice, and talent, too, I found in Miss Delia Mason, who made of her part as Lady Betty's friend a primrose path adorned with a primrose song. Miss Eva Sandford also, as Lady Betty's maid, showed fine qualities for comedy.

Among songs I heard with especial pleasure I may mention, "It's a Way we have in the Army," sung by Captain Harrington (Mr. J. Edward Fraser), Miss Delia Mason's "Who? Who? Who?" and "Nerves, Nerves," Stony Stratford's and Posh's duet, Mr. Maurice Farkoa's "I like you in velvet; I love you in plush," Miss Adrienne Augarde's "Little Dog," and, besides the Colonel's song already mentioned, that most humorous duet of Mr. G. P. Huntley and Mr. Aubrey Fitzgerald, where the former caps the utterance of the latter with amiable ironies.

So much, then, for "Lady Madcap" and Egbert Castle, a country seat in London which will have open doors and many visitors for many months to come.

"Ladyland," at the Avenue, is another musical comedy which comes up for criticism this week. In this composite form of entertainment it is possible for the total effect to fail of pleasing, and yet for certain elements of it to have excellences of their own obscured through force of circumstances. Such are the performances of Miss Ethel Irving as the Queen of Ladyland, a clever burlesque of Napoleonic femininity, the singing of Miss Aline May as the Great Lady of Ladyland, of Mr. Richard Green as one of the adventurers who descends from the balloon, and the playing of Miss Kitty Lindley as the waitress. Mr. Austin Melford, too, worked hard as Professor Puddle, and Mr. George Giddens as the Miller's son. But there is no blinking the fact that the total effect of "Ladyland" was not pleasing, although Mr. Frank Lambert furnished some graceful if derivative music to the scene and Mr. Eustace Ponsonby did his best with the libretto.

"A Little Brown Branch," produced at the Court Theatre last week, is a comedy in three acts which has considerable merit. A middle-aged sister, head of a sort of activity home for the overstrung, loves, and is loved by her manager. This lady's sister arrives, and the middle-aged manager speedily transfers to her his affections. The play develops the psychology of these three personages with very considerable skill, and the final renouncement by the elder of the sisters gave Miss Frances Ivor an opportunity for a beautiful piece of true pathos. Miss Winifred Fraser, as the younger sister, did the girlish ingenuousness of Priscilla Farquharson full justice, and Mr. Berte Thomas (the author of the comedy) played his own creation, the part of the fickle-hearted manager, with desirable conviction. Comic relief was abundantly furnished by the patients in the activity home, where all have to work hard at manual labour, and the sentimentality of the audience secured its balsam for the wounds of the elder sister in the boyish love for her of John Brown, whose courtship found in Mr. Graham Browne an able and sympathetic exponent. An interesting play, which I should be glad to see a second time.

"Charley's Aunt" has had a successful migration to the Comedy Theatre. The author, Mr. Brandon Thomas, Mr. Walter Beaumont, Mr. Stanley Cooke, and Mr. Sydney Compton, do well in it as Sir Francis Chesney, the solicitor, an Oxford undergraduate, and a college scout respectively. The remainder of the cast did not strike me as particularly strong, yet the performance does not fail of many happy moments, and of the play itself enough has been said in merely naming it.

The Germans give us this week "Die Goldene Spinne," and "Traumulus." The Great Queen-street Theatre reopens on Monday, January 2, with "Alt Heidelberg," and on the 5th will be given Hauptmann's "Die Weber." There will also be a special performance of "Alt Heidelberg" on Boxing Day.

The benefit matinée at His Majesty's Theatre for Mrs. Edmund Phelps resulted, I am glad to say, in a net profit of over four hundred pounds, including a donation from Sir Charles Wyndham.

NOTES FROM PARIS.

THE SYVETON SCANDALS.

IN their outcry against Masonic assassins and murderers suborned by Combes, the admirers of the late M. Syveton have forced the Criminal Investigations Department not to let the dead rest. The consequences have been terrible for his posthumous reputation. We now see in him a bourgeois Cenci, without a Guido to plead mitigating circumstances in an immortal portrait. In committing suicide Syveton avoided a moral pillory, and possibly the official justice of his country. The poet Coppée, Jules Lemaître, and Léon Daudet must now feel rather foolish. Comte Boni de Castellane, who attended the funeral as admirer and sympathiser, reserved expressing his opinion there on the subject of the "mysterious murder."

To write at all fully about the involved drama one would have to call a whole vocabulary from a medical dictionary, or to have the daring of a Brieux. The storm which a fortnight back had been long gathering on the horizon must have appeared black to M. and Mme. Syveton, a pair evenly matched in age, she being just turned forty, and he close upon his fortieth birthday. If they had not been apprehensive of some blow of fate they would not have gone to consult chiromancists. He went last spring to Mme. Thèbes, who professed to read on his hand proud wilfulness, irascibility, calculating impulsiveness, which she feared would lead to a tragical deadlock. She might have detected vanity in his saying as he left: "I am M. Syveton." One does not give one's address to a chiromancist, and Frenchmen are reserved in such matters from the fear of looking foolish. Had the hand-reader seen in him a Robespierre wrong side out, she would not have been at fault.

Mme. Syveton, who would still be handsome were it not for the vulgarity of her coutenance, went, on her side, to consult Mme. Fraya, the rival of Mme. Thèbes. She revealed to the pythoness a strong situation by saying, as she sat down: "I want no concealment. Mind you tell me the whole truth, however painful it may be." You can picture to yourself the chiromancist pricking her ears at this. As she spoke of second marriage and widowhood, the visitor afforded her another glimpse by saying snappishly: "You rave when you talk of second widowhood. My husband enjoys robust health." "He may be as strong as an athlete, but that will not prevent his death, and in a short time." "How will he die? Accidentally?" "No; he will commit suicide." "Don't stuff me up with such nonsense; men no longer have the pluck to commit suicide." Mme. Fraya, seeing she had to deal with a disappointed woman, unhappy in her home life, spoke soothingly. Her visitor, interrupting, asked when she might expect this tragedy. "I told you already—shortly." The lady made a gesture of incredulity and then said, "I am Mme. Syveton, wife of the deputy."

The Church forbids fortune-telling. Nevertheless, society ladies, most of whom have been educated in convents, enable pythonesses to live in opulence. It does not surprise me to hear of Baroness de Gail going to consult Mme. Fraya when Captain de Gail challenged M. Syveton. The Baroness received the comforting assurance that her husband, to whom she is attached, would come safely out of the duel, and that if he waited another month there would be no duel; Syveton would then be dead. The day following that of his death the Baroness wrote to the chiromancist asking for another appointment, this time at half-past six in the evening. She in her note congratulated Mme. Fraya on the accomplishment on the previous day of her "sinister prediction."

The person who consults a fortune-teller owns himself a waiter on chance and the sport of circumstances. There is but one way for keeping our withers unwrung. It is to make in a rational, honest way the most of the present moment. Destiny, in the main, I believe in, and I also believe that we can, as French mechanics say, donner du jeu to the machine, and so escape from being prematurely crushed. Look closely into the evil actions of Governments, and you will find that most of them were due to a fear of the future and a vain determination to control it. In doing simply the right thing commanded by the circumstances of the day, crimes and disaster would have been avoided. Had Macbeth kept afar from the witches, and Hamlet turned a deaf ear to the ghost, there would not have been the tragedies called after them. Saul's disastrous end followed soon on his visit to the Witch of Endor and his vision of the dead prophet Samuel. Belief in an apparition unmanned Brutus. Syveton, after his interview with Mme. Thèbes, may have imagined it was useless to war against his well-masked sensuality. He had been seeking a derivative from an unholy passion in the society of Mme. Syveton's Flemish femme de chambre, Anna Spilmacher, since the necessary link in the chain of untoward and tragical incidents. The wretched being had also sought distractions in the neighbourhood of the Moulin Rouge. Before the war he sometimes rubbed shoulders there with Grand Dukes studying la vie Parisienne at Eugénie Buffet's theatre and the Red Mill. Since he assailed General André he went to the director of a gymnastic establishment to arrange for a course of training. He particularly desired to develop the chest, the biceps, the deltoid, and to have boxing lessons. The course was to have begun on the Monday which, as it since fell out, came next to his funeral. As he left he let fall his eye-glass and broke it. This struck him as a bad omen. He might have been dreaming of a triumphal acquittal, and regretting that the state of his muscles had not allowed him to inflict severer blows on General André. Had he not looked forward to a favourable verdict, he would not have given the professor of gymnastics an earnest of the training fees.

The intervention of Anna Spilmacher, the Flemish femme de chambre, has been alluded to. Syveton had sinned against her grievously. She was led into the tragedy under these circumstances. Mme. Ménard, as the storm gathered, felt it perhaps coming on, as she suffered severely from depression. She heard acquaintances speak of "Le Friquet" as amusing, and of Polaire as impayable. Expressing a wish to her husband to see that strange star, he took her to the Gymnase. She followed the crowd in weeping at Le Friquet's pathetic end, and returned home with a cold and feverish symptoms. The fever clung to her. Some nights later she awoke, terrified from a bad dream, and, calling for help, Anna and her husband rushed to her assistance. In Flemish Mme. Ménard told her dream to Anna. She had dreamt that she and Syveton, chained together, were in a parched desert, hot as an oven. On the other side of a road were fields that seemed cool, in which slaves worked in obedience to the lash of a cruel taskmaster. She and her companion tried to cross over to them, but were driven back by the scorching breath of a demon. He told them that from hell, where she was, there could be no redemption. The slaves she saw worked out their salvation in Purgatory. Anna, a pious Belgian, believed the dream to be sent as a warning, and urged Mme. Ménard to confess about two visits her stepfather had paid her. He could not but forgive her when he knew all. Besides, he loved her as he loved his life. Mme. Ménard broke down. Anna, confident in the moral innocence of her mistress, gave a fuller account. Ménard next morning went to Syveton to upbraid and threaten him.

The attempts of the Nationalist papers to make out Mme. Ménard a hysterical calumniator of their hero are sickening. Syveton took a high place at the École Normale des Hautes Études. He went thence to Angoulême to teach history in an upper class in the lycée where Taine filled the same chair. There he made the acquaintance of a fairly rich widow, to whom he became engaged. The wedding took place in Paris, and the newly-married pair went to Rheims, whither Syveton had been shifted. With her money and hospitality they soon took a leading place in Society. Syveton followed the Archbishop as a Catholic-Socialist, attended with the heads of the Right workmen's banquets, patronised pilgrimages, and noisily quarrelled with the Department of Public Instruction. His wife encouraged him to cast aside his professor's gown, go to Paris, and make a mark as Nationalist-Socialist and Republican of the Jules Lemaître shade. He took her advice. It answered. The electoral district which owes so much to Notre Dame des Victoires sent him to the Chamber. Since he went there the Right of the Academy wondered whether the time was not ripe for his candidature to a seat there. He had written a work on the diplomacy of Louis XIV. and Charles XII. of Sweden, and had collected materials for a history of Champagne which would deal with Henry V. at Troyes, his marriage there with Katharine of France, the Champenoise family of Joan of Arc and Joan's mission. He had industry, a sure scent in hunting up documents, and a cultivated style, but wanted originality and life. Nature had denied him the vivifying faculty of imagination.

Three Feminist dramatic authors have been asked by the Minister of Justice to belong to the Commission for the revision of the Code. This honour agreeably surprised them. They owe it to the feminine demonstrations against the Code on its hundredth anniversary. The three are Brieux, Marcel Prévost, and Capus. The brothers Rosny and the brothers Margueritte were thought of. The Ministers, thinking them rather artists than logicians, crossed out their names. Another objection presented itself. Each pair of brothers are inseparable. One Rosny and one Margueritte might be desirable, but not two Rosnys and two Margueritte. Capus passed through the Polytechnic, and came out a civil engineer with a tip-top number. Prévost also received a mathematical education, and was destined for the engineering profession. Brieux' forte used to be, in his apprentice days, mensuration and geometrical drawing. He began life as a carpenter. Capus brings his engineering education to bear on the framework of his plays. I look on the appointment of these authors as a great stride forward. A Commission entirely made up of jurists would have been too respectful of the dead or baleful articles of the Code. Those articles relating to women are more Corsican than French. They are the especial work of Napoleon, and reflect his barbarous spirit. He had long, when he began to legislate, been deeply wounded by Joséphine's infidelities. On the whole, Frenchwomen had a far better legal position up to 1804 than since. Equal division of parents' property between sons and daughters was universal in the bourgeoisie. In most provinces primogeniture had narrow limits. Ladies holding fiefs had a right to appear by deputy in the States-General of the Kingdom. If they did not appear in person it was to spare them long and dangerous journeys. Mahaud or Maud, Countess of Champagne in her own right, held the sword at a Royal coronation. The poetic sentiments of the Troubadours ran into feudal institutions, and guided the action of the noble class. The Abbess of Fontevrault governed more monasteries than convents, and sent representatives to General Councils of the Church. A sister of Mme. de Montespan had twenty-five monasteries under her abbatial staff, and seventeen convents. Half the recluses of her abbey were men, and laboured in the fields and in workshops "as the perpetual servants of the Lady Abbess and her daughters."

M. Bourgeois, who represents France at The Hague Peace Conference, is also to be on the Commission for the revision of the Code. He originated the idea of bringing in dramatic authors who had kept close to the conditions of modern life in writing plays. They had seen better than lawyers what shoes pinched. Is there any other country except France in which a great statesman would have proposed such a thing? M. Bourgeois is a confirmed Feminist, and so, also, is his son, who has just brought out a work on tuberculosis.

Mistral, the Provençal poet, will devote his share of the Nobel prize for poetry to a museum at Arles. The nucleus will be formed of his collection, which is in three sections, and represents Christian art in Provence before the Renaissance. Mistral is an enthusiastic partisan of Home Rule for Provence. He thinks the South of France oppressed, and, what is worse, warped by the preponderance of the North or Gallo-Frankish region. Mistral could have written in French with more pecuniary profit, but from patriotism confined himself, as a poet, to his native patois. His "Mireille," which inspired Gounod's opera, brought him fame, and what seems to him riches. His songs and tales have a prodigious sale all along the Rhône and Garonne, where the langue d'oc is understood. He lives at Maillanes, between St. Rémy and Arles, in a part of France famed for the beauty of its people. The St. Rémy women are of a purer antique type than the Arlésiennes (who are too close to the railway), and all the sickly Northerners that it dumps every winter on the sunny South. His house when I called on him many years ago was a small, low box, with a frontage of three windows with green Venetian shutters and thick carpets serving for blinds. It had shelter from the sirocco, the Alpine range lying between it and the plain of the Crau. I hear that he has since lengthened the façade by two windows and added to his garden and farm. One can judge of the disposition of the master of the house by the amiability of the dog. Mistral's dogs lick the hands of visitors whom they see for the first time. He and his wife and dog visited the 1900 Exhibition, and were made much of by the literary world and the President. The latter, patting the dog on the head, said, "C'est un vrai loubet." He then explained that the shepherds' dogs of the Cevennes, so ardent in attacking wolves, are called loubets. Mistral under all circumstances is faithful to the costume of his district. It is that worn by Mireille's lover in Gounod's opera. Mme. Mistral is a Dijonnaise. She promised the poet before their betrothal to dress like a Maillanes peasant from the day of her marriage. Her white neckerchief has on Sunday, and when she receives company, a deep border of old lace, and the broad black ribbon surrounding the white caul of her cap is gold-fringed and embroidered. She has thoroughly entered into the spirit of Provence.

Mistral is for international unity in diversity. The flowers in God's own garden bore fruits and flowers each after its kind, and all very good. The Emperor of Brazil, when last in the South of France, invited the félibre poet to come and dine with him at his hotel. Ill-health, the gentleman who took the message said, prevented his Imperial Majesty going to Maillanes to present the homage of his admiration. Mistral went. Emperor and poet conversed about the struggle for primacy among the languages of the great States of the world and for bare existence among the small States. Pedro expressed his heartiest sympathy with the félibre movement. He congratulated Mistral on writing his glowing and musical poems in Provençal. "In preferring that vehicle," he said, "you defend the Portuguese, Basque, Swedish, Norse, Danish, and Irish tongues, and the souls of the people who originated them."

The King of Portugal is heedless of the wet weather. He goes about in downpours in his brown suit and hat without the shelter of mackintosh or umbrella. The spray of the Atlantic has, he gaily said to a French acquaintance who remonstrated, too often ducked him for the rain of Paris to upset his habits. The King admits himself to be très gourmand and to have the memory of the palate. Mme. Loubet had the satisfaction of hearing from him that "on mange mieux en France que dans tout autre pays." He owns to having made attempts to penetrate the secrets of la cuisine française, and in different yachting tours applied his culinary lore with some success. As his experience widens his taste becomes simpler and he finds himself more appreciative of Brillat-Savarin's maxims. English meats nature are a delicious treat to the foreign gastronome for a week or ten days. One is then glad to return to la cuisine travaillée of the French chef. The Italians know best how to make ices and vegetable soups. What can be better than a soupe florentine or a soupe milanaise? The Condé cake is a matchless culinary triumph of Chantilly. The Duc d'Aumale spoke of it as light enough to be carried by butterflies.

LETTER FROM THE LINKMAN.

THE Unemployed Upper-Ten, dear Lady Betty, are attracting general attention. The distress that exists in Mayfair, Belgravia, and South Kensington, has never been equalled, and it is the more to be regretted as it is mostly due to the obstinate refusal of the public to contribute money to spurious gold mines, and fraudulent financial and industrial undertakings.

In these democratic times we hear much of the community of interests, but the theory of community of capital is mere Socialism; all capital should be in the hands of the few.

Mr. Maurice Felberheim, the Honorary Secretary to the Unemployed Upper-Ten Relief Committee, has informed the representatives of the Press that the committee are already providing over eight hundred free luncheons, dinners, and suppers, a day to titled and prominent paupers, and are giving employment to two hundred and sixty-five young married women, the latter relief at a cost which cannot yet be accurately estimated. Over four thousand destitute dukes and duchesses, pauper peers and peeresses, and other members of the submerged Upper-Ten, have already registered their names for relief by leaving cards on the rich and prominent aliens who have recently removed from the neighbourhood of Petticoat-lane to that of Piccadilly.

It is singularly unfortunate that at such a crisis we should have to rely entirely on private effort to relieve the distress which exists, for the Government is powerless as the country hesitates to approve of the proposed return to Protection, which would compel the multitude to sacrifice itself for the benefit of the few.

MAYFAIR ARMY OPERATIONS.

Meeting at Hamburg House.

Mr. Adolph Bernhoffer took the chair yesterday afternoon at a meeting held at Hamburg House, Berkeley-square, to consider the work of the Mayfair Army to assist the Unemployed Upper Ten.

The Chairman explained that the clearance schemes elaborated by the late Mr. Gladstone (general hissing) had made it impossible for thousands of well-connected men to obtain the only kind of work which is suited to their ability and habits. (Renewed hissing.) Most of the men of this class, in consequence of their want of intelligence, ignorance, and indolence, were only fitted for the highest forms of employment under Government (hear! hear!), and by closing to many of them these occupations they had been thrown on the ordinary markets, where education, intelligence, industry, and occasionally even integrity, were indispensable (cries of "Shame! shame!"), and, of course, their services were not desired in those directions. (A voice: "And they would not be obtained if they were." Loud cheers greeted this interruption.) The Unionist (a voice: "The Imperialist") Governments had endeavoured courageously to repair the injury caused by the late Mr. Gladstone. They had produced a war in South Africa which had for several years enormously increased the demand for inefficient and untrained officers. It was altogether an error to suppose that an officer should be a better kind of soldier; he is a better-paid (vociferous cheers), a better-housed, a better-fed, a better-clothed soldier, and is better respected in consequence of being better bred and better treated. (This eloquent digression was rewarded with an outburst of cheers.) That war, however, had disappointed them all, for since the annexation of the Transvaal and the Orange Free State, South Africa had produced considerably less wealth than it did before, and had provided far less opportunities for company promoters, unscrupulous directors, concession agents, and adventurers, than it did when the corrupt Boer Governments tyrannised over the alien population, and paralysed industry and trade in those countries. Until the war South Africa had been sending gold to England; since the war England had been sending gold to South Africa. The policy of Imperialism had, of course, as it was intended, made it necessary to increase the Army and Navy, and so augmented the number of officers required, and had caused a further demand for inexperienced Governors, Colonial Secretaries, Administrators, and Colonial Office clerks; but that only provided employment for a few hundreds at the most. We must, without delay, enormously increase the Army, Navy, and the number of appointments at the disposal of the Civil Service Commissioners, so as to create high-class employment for impecunious peers and their connections. We must nail the Government to the great Tory principle, to the Unionist and Imperialist principle, which he might describe in a newly-coined phrase—a competence for the incompetent. (Loud and prolonged cheering.) "I am the State," said Louis XIV. "We are the community," the upper class of this country was entitled to say; and it is the duty of the millions to support the class which in return munificently contributes to provide for the multitude parish relief, workhouses, asylums, police-stations, reformatories, and prisons. (A Voice: "Why are the warders always appointed from the lower ranks?") Pending developments in the directions that the Chairman had mentioned, the Mayfair Army and the Relief Committee must endeavour to provide for the impecunious well-connected those luxuries which to them are the barest necessities. They must have money to bet and gamble with, and to give dinners and suppers with—not, however, to dress with. That, the Chairman said, he would not countenance for an instant; he was strenuously opposed to waste or extravagance in any form. There was no reputable well-connected man, who would not dress himself admirably, even if he had to do so at his tailor's expense. (Prolonged and vociferous cheering, during which an unemployed director of spurious companies was detected attempting to pick pockets, and was ejected from the building. His name did not transpire, but he was understood to explain that, in his capacity of director, it was his main duty to transfer the money of others from their pockets to his, and that, therefore, he had only been occupied in the exercise of his profession. When the excitement subsided, the Chairman continued.) Almost every reputable profession is gravely affected by the deplorable conditions that prevail. The state of the fraudulent investment markets is disheartening, and the investor of moderate means is most seriously to blame for refusing to contribute his small savings—at whatever sacrifice to himself, and any who are dependent upon him—for the benefit of those employed in such undertakings. (Furious hissing.) Thousands of willing hands are idle at this moment amongst the company promoters, directors, concession agents, stock-brokers' runners, insurance agents, wine-merchants' agents, tobacconists' agents, motor-car agents, horse-dealers' agents, art-dealers' agents—(here the entire audience spontaneously rose and sang the beautiful hymn, "I want to be an Agent, And with the Agents stand")—ball and entertainment organisers, and "society" introducers. We must, collectively and individually, find work for those willing hands; wealth must be made to circulate. . . . (At this moment the Chairman happened to put his hand to his waistcoat pocket, and, discovering that his watch and chain had been abstracted, leapt into the midst of the audience, and a scene of indescribable confusion ensued, the noise caused by which, however, was drowned by the enthusiastic singing of "Rule, Belgravia, Belgravia rules the knaves, Britons ever, ever, ever shall be slaves.")

The hundreds of titled and well-connected unemployed who were present unanimously supported the motion, hastily proposed by the Vice-Chairman, that the meeting should immediately disperse, and hurriedly left the building. It was too late discovered that Hamburg House had been completely stripped of the valuable portable property it contained.

* * * * *

Circumstances have so generally altered the conditions of life in these days that we may be said to be living in a new world; there are some who are endeavouring to produce a new other world! Ghosts and ghouls, monsters and magicians, fairies, good or bad, and giants and ogres, are gradually being removed from our midst. They are generally now exposed in the pantomimes, and in the story-books for children, and are altogether ignored in the Christmas numbers of the newspapers and magazines, and in our literature. Those who are deeply attached to the imaginary world—and they are the most intelligent—will be grateful to Miss Marie Corelli for having given renewed popularity to the hobgoblin. Her "Strange Visitation of Josiah McNason" has many other attractions, of course, and one of the chief of them is the "Goblin's Hymn."

* * * * *

The writer for many years past has urged the editors of English newspapers to adopt the system of colour-printed advertisements, which is in common use in the United States and throughout the Continent. A fort-night ago he directed attention to the Christmas number of the Connoisseur, which has some admirable colour-printed advertisements. It appears that the Editor of the Bystander had already adopted the suggestion, for there were coloured advertisements even in the first number of that admirable publication. It is but fair to add this to the paragraph which recently appeared.—Believe me to be, very truly yours,

MARMADUKE.

SPORTING NOTES.

I AM informed that Lord Davey has arranged to bring in a measure for the abolition of street betting directly after the meeting of Parliament, and its progress will be facilitated by the Government in both Houses. Strong protests have been addressed from influential quarters to various Ministers against the apathy with which they apparently regarded the measure of last Session, and their lack of zeal in extinguishing this "great social evil" (as I see it is described) has been severely criticised at the numerous diocesan conferences and similar gatherings which were held during the autumn. With a general election in prospect, no Ministry would be likely to resist the importunities of a powerful and active section of serious society, and on this question all parties of Churchmen and all sects of Dissenters are cordially united. I understand that Lord Davey's measure is of a drastic character, including the following provisions:—

> Any person frequenting a street, park, or garden, for himself or another person, for the purpose of bookmaking, or betting, or wagering, or agreeing to bet or wager, or paying, or receiving, or settling bets will, if this measure is accepted, be fined £10 for the first offence, £20 for a second, and £50, or six months' imprisonment, for a subsequent offence, or for carrying on a transaction with a person under sixteen years of age.

I wish most heartily that a measure could be devised to abolish starting-price betting, which is a most pernicious nuisance, and the curse of the Turf at the present time. The establishments in London and elsewhere at which this form of speculation is regularly carried on must be perfectly well known to the police, and if the law as it now stands would not justify their being closed, then the sooner the law is altered the better.

Lord Durham's salutary and well-timed attack on those sporting papers which insert the obviously mendacious advertisements of tipsters is not likely to have any practical results unless he can follow it up by taking some vigorous steps against the offending journals. Non possumus seems to be the reply to Lord Durham, the fact being that the papers in question cannot afford to refuse the objectionable advertisements. Mr. Corlett is vehemently denounced because he did not turn upon Lord Durham and rend him at the Gimcrack Club dinner, but I do not understand why he should be expected to undertake such an embarrassing task, especially as tipsters' advertisements have been for many years excluded from the Sporting Times. It would be paying the Sportsman writers a most extravagant compliment to describe what I suppose they consider to be their arguments on this subject as sophistical, for seldom has more abject rot been printed. The fact is that the purely sporting papers (among which I do not include the Field) have not a particle of influence among any section of the racing classes, from the Jockey Club downwards. Their views attract no more attention than the croaking of a frog, the sneezing of a black-beetle, or the buzzing of a bluebottle fly. One need not discuss the causes which have plunged these journals into such utter contempt. During the last twenty-five years I have received many scores of letters from all sections of racing society, beginning with members of the Jockey Club and prominent owners, in which the ignominious position of the sporting Press has been deplored, and the writer has explained that he has communicated with me simply because TRUTH is almost alone in taking an absolutely independent position when commenting upon Turf affairs. When writers are obliged to have an eye to considerations connected with their advertisement columns, they cannot be expected to indulge in any real freedom of expression. The late M. Lefevre, who was a sharp, cynical man of business, under a most genial exterior, took the measure of the English sporting Press after a few weeks, and at the end of his first season he expressed his wish to make some solid acknowledgment of the pleasing manner in which he had been treated by the various writers. Cheques, cases of champagne and claret, both of the very best, and boxes of admirable cigars were distributed with a lavish hand, and M. Lefevre, of course, continued to be an object of adoration and eulogy to the sporting papers during the remainder of his career in England. This was more than thirty years ago, and no doubt a more elevated moral tone now prevails. The irregularity of reporters "standing in" with an owner who had a good thing is now presumably an aberration of the past, but it is clear that when such transactions were common, free criticism (if there was reason for the same) could not be expected, as the writers were simply "nobbled." I remember a good story in this connection. X, a leading owner and member of the Jockey Club, was on friendly terms with Z, the sporting writer on two important papers. Z invariably "stood" from £10 to £25 with X whenever he fancied his candidate, but Z never was asked to pay when the animal lost. Of course, all references to the "astute tactics" of the very clever (i.e., unscrupulous) stable in which X trained were written by Z in accordance with his wishes, and in those days of heavy betting weeks and months in advance of the race, horses could be written up or depreciated (as the case might be) with considerable ultimate profit to those behind the scenes. X had "a certainty" for a most important handicap, and had himself backed the horse (which had been "steadied" with a truly admirable audacity) to win £40,000. The good thing was just beaten owing to the stupidity of the jockey, who threw away the race. Next day Z was lachrymose in the extreme over this tragical disappointment, and his paper gushed over with sympathy for X, while the jockey was abused in every variety of invective. Settling day arrived, and X, of course, received back his account without its being credited with the £25 which Z had "stood." He was a very rich man, and the "bad week" was of not the slightest importance to him, especially as it had only followed upon many "good weeks." However, X was in a temper, and he directed the individual who settled his account to "demand" that £25, and to threaten severe proceedings unless it was forthcoming. The money was paid, and a day or two later what a commination did Z produce in his paper about the abominable misdeeds of X's stable! He "went for" them with a will, and X was held up to the scorn and contempt of the Turf. X, however, was a sensible man, and took a practical view of affairs, and he seized an early opportunity of making his peace with Z, who thereupon resumed his friendly attitude, and harmonious relations continued undisturbed until both X and Z were withdrawn to another sphere of existence.

I stated some weeks ago that Rock Sand has been undergoing a course of veterinary treatment since the beginning of October, which has proved successful, so it is hoped he will stand training again. It was thought that the last had been seen of him on the Turf after his race for the Jockey Club Stakes at Newmarket on September 29. I am informed that he will not run either at Epsom (in the Coronation Cup) or at Ascot (in the Gold Cup), but that he will undergo a special preparation for the Princess of Wales's Stakes of £10,000 at the Newmarket First July meeting. This valuable stake appears to be merely a question of health for Sir James Miller's horse, whose 14 lb. penalty is reduced to 5 lb. by a breeding allowance, which certainly ought not to be enjoyed as a perpetual benefit, but it should be extinguished in the case of the winner of any stake of the value of (say) £4,000. The entry for the Princess of Wales's Stakes now includes nothing of any note except St. Amant and John o' Gaunt. Mr. de Rothschild's horse would have 7 lb. the worse of the weights with Rock Sand, and he could not stay this severe course. John o' Gaunt is not likely to stand training, and under no circumstances would I believe in his beating Rock Sand with only 2 lb. the better of the weights. Sir James Miller's horse is also engaged in the Goodwood Cup and in the Jockey Club Stakes.

I hear that Zinfandel, who was showing a great deal of temper during the autumn, has calmed down considerably as a result of his being judiciously exercised on the roads. He has grown into a splendid horse, and he appears to be perfectly sound. Lord Howard de Walden's steed will be trained for the Ascot Cup, and he ought of course to have won that race last season. His only important engagement for next year at present is the Hardwicke Stakes at Ascot, which will be worth £2,830, and the entry is a very poor one in point of class.

Henry the First and Admiral Breeze appear likely to train into useful four-year-olds, and both horses can stay well. If anything should happen to Rock Sand either one or other of Mr. Musker's horses would appear to have an excellent chance of winning the Princess of Wales's Stakes, and Henry the First's prospect of carrying off the Goodwood Cup is decidedly promising. Both horses are engaged in the Eclipse Stakes at Sandown Park, but that rich race is tolerably certain to be taken next season by a three-year-old, and M. E. Blanc has Adam, Jardy, and Val d'Or all entered. The Eclipse Stakes is the only engagement in England of the brother to Ajax.

Mr. Musker's costly two-year-olds Lilla and Sly Vixen are never likely to do much good on the Turf, and as they commenced last season with thirty-six engagements, there will be a heavy bill to pay for their forfeits in addition to their original cost and the training expenses. Lilla, by St. Simon out of Melody, was bred by Sir Daniel Cooper, and she cost 2,000 gs. at the sale of his yearlings in July, 1903. Sly Vixen, by Flying Fox out of Hamiltrude, was bred by Mr. R. A. Brice, and was purchased by Mr. Musker at Newmarket during the First October week for 2,000 gs. These animals are both remarkably well bred, and their owner may be compensated by their successes at the stud for their complete failure on the Turf.

The Derby betting reported in last week's sporting papers is all trash and nonsense and wholly unworthy of notice. If there were really any betting "to money" or a genuine desire in any quarter to invest largely it would be much wiser to leave the race alone for a long time to come, as everything depends upon M. E. Blanc's policy. If any one is compelled to bet on the Derby at present, the only conceivable business for any sensible person is to back the French pair coupled. I expect that M. E. Blanc will send over either Jardy or Val d'Or to Newmarket some time before the Two Thousand is run, and that if the colt selected to carry his colours in that race proves the winner, then the animal will remain in England until after the Derby, and will represent his owner also at Epsom. This will leave M. Blanc with Adam and either Val d'Or or Jardy to run for him in the great French three-year-old stakes. As to the English lot, I would most assuredly prefer to take 100 to 9 about Rouge Croix, winner of the Dewhurst Plate, rather than accept 4 to 1 about Cicero. I quite believe that if Cicero had started for the Middle Park Plate he would have been easily beaten by Jardy. The fact is that Cicero's two-year-old form does not bear the test of investigation well. Lord Rosebery's colt won his races easily, but he never beat anything of really good form. The simpletons who take 25 to 1 about such doleful candidates as Bishopscourt and Golden Measure surely ought not to be at large. In the old days, when winter betting on the Derby was a reality and not an idiotic sham, animals with such contemptible public form would have stood at 66 to 1 offered, and even at that price there would have been no backers except infatuated addle-heads. It will be full time to invest money on the Derby after the race for the Newmarket Stakes, in which Cicero, Rouge Croix, Llangibby, Polymelus, Bishopscourt, and Comedian are engaged.

The Duke of Westminster, whose colours have been exceedingly unfortunate ever since he began racing after his grandfather's death, now has thirteen horses in training at Kingsclere, of which lot eight are yearlings, all of which were bred at Eaton. Among them are Pipistrello, own brother to Flying Fox; Crown Gem, own brother to Sceptre; Rhos, own brother to Mr. Faber's horse Duke of Westminster; Rydal Fell, half-sister, by Ladas, to Rydal Head; Chondrine, by Isinglass out of Lowood; and Mary Orme, by Orme out of Princess Mary. The Duke will have to depend mainly on his two-year-olds next season, as the five older horses are exceedingly moderate. Rydal Head's three-year-old running was very poor, and the others are even worse, judging from their public form. Wetaria, the two-year-old sister to Flying Fox, is a complete failure, and it is a great pity that Vampire should have been sent for so many successive seasons to Orme. It is a repetition of the same mistake which the late Duke of Westminster committed with Lily Agnes after she had produced Ormonde, the mare being mated year after year with Bend Or, and the result was altogether disastrous.

Lord Alington and Sir Frederick Johnstone have registered a partnership in the three-year-old Plum-centre, and in three two-year-olds, one of which is a half-brother to Plum-centre, by Simontault. It is probable that Lord Alington will be put up for the Jockey Club either at the winter meeting of the members or at one of those held during the Newmarket Spring weeks. The late Lord Alington was elected to the Jockey Club as Mr. Gerard Sturt, and he was a member for more than half a century. Lord Alington, by the way, was anxious some twenty years ago that his friend, the late Mr. Bankes, of Kingston Lacy, should become a candidate for the Jockey Club, but he never cared to be put up.

A considerable disappointment of the autumn was Mr. Dresden's Galangal, who was regarded as one of the very best two-year-olds of the season after he had run a dead-heat with Verdiana for the Champagne Stakes at Doncaster, but his laurels were grievously tarnished by his subsequent displays.

Early in the season there was a great deal of chatter about Mr. James's Atlas, by Isinglass out of The Gorgon, who was expected to prove himself a veritable flyer, but he sadly disappointed the high expectations of his friends, and during the latter part of the year he more than once ran like a rogue. He is not only very moderate, but also hopelessly uncertain. It is probable that Lord Wolverton's colt by Persimmon out of Perfect Dream will ultimately turn out to be the best of the Egerton House three-year-olds, and he may win some good races if he is judiciously placed. This colt commenced last season with fifty-four engagements, and he was one of the most heavily entered two-year-olds in training.

Prior to the North and South trial match at Devonport the Rugby Union Committee had a meeting. There was some important business. The International match next year against the New Zealanders was fixed to be played in London on December 2. Then—to follow the curious wording of the report—"Mr. Crane read some correspondence from Handsworth F.C. re their having played a man named A. W. Robinson, a Northern Union player, as A. T. Pearson." Never did words more beautifully phrase the superlative contempt with which the Rugby Union regards those football outcasts—the Northern Union. To play with them, even to sign their playing forms, is to become tainted with football leprosy, and the undefiled of the Rugby Union will have nothing to do with such company. The man referred to is, I am told, the old Rugby Union international three-quarter. He went to Hull, and there they play under Northern Union rules, and he lost caste. No bacillus known to science can spread disease more effectively than he has done. Under the rules of the Rugby Union all the players of the Handsworth club and all the teams that have played against them when "the man" was playing have become tainted. I am not at all sure that all those other clubs have not in their turn infected all the teams against which they have played, and so on. For the caste rules of the Rugby Union are very strict. Did not they make every one a professional who subscribed to the testimonial to A. J. Gould, the Welsh International, and in the list was the late Sir William Vernon Harcourt? And yet Consols never dropped a sixteenth. The Rugby Union made itself very ridiculous on that occasion. It will not now do much for its dignity if it refers in such a disdainful way to an old International, who, for anything to the contrary that I know, may be the victim of the Union's cast-iron legislation, rather than a wilful wanderer from the path of virtue. I sincerely trust that the high priests of the Union will be able to cleanse their faithful followers from the contamination of "the man." When that is done, perhaps the Union authorities will try to regard matters in a more reasonable light. Of course, I know the difficulty. The Northern Union players are paid for broken time. They are to all intents and purposes professional teams. The Rugby Union has very properly set its face against professionalism. But surely a man may remain a gentleman and even an amateur although he plays with professionals. I know that any change in the present rule is opposed on the ground that the few must suffer for the good of the many. But I have yet to learn that gross injustice should prevail in order that the many should be secured from the perils of temptation. It is surely unnecessary to debar all young fellows who live in the Northern Union districts either from any football or, at all events, from the only game that is played. The difficulty would be, to a great extent, overcome if any Rugby Union player desiring to play for the Northern Union as an amateur were first of all required to get the Rugby Union's assent. In this way a register of players would be kept, and then the Union might reserve to itself the right to call upon any player to satisfy the authorities that he had behaved as an amateur if he should at any future date desire to return to the Rugby Union. I cannot see why some such arrangement should not be arrived at. But at present the punishment in no sense whatever can be said to fit the crime.

The inter-University Rugby match resulted in rather a lucky win for Cambridge. Cheyne, the Oxford back, made one bad blunder and let in the Cambridge three-quarter. However, he did many good things, and stopped one or two apparently certain tries, so that it is rather hard lines to blame him. The game was exciting enough during the first half, when all the scoring was done—three goals to Cambridge and two goals to Oxford. The feature of the game had been the play of the four half-backs. The three-quarters were scarcely as well together as one had hoped. The forwards were below the average. The Cambridge men had weight, but did not use it, and the sublime stupidity of a forward who persistently dragged the ball back into the scrimmage instead of heeling it out smartly deserves to be commemorated. Pembroke had the largest number of blues in the team. The Reverend Master of that college recently mourned before the Senate that if Greek were abolished in the Little Go, then the curate would not be able to read the Greek Testament. I was much struck by the originality of the argument. The average curate and that forward seemed to have a similar degree of intelligence. During the second half there was much throwing of the ball hither and thither, but it was not high-class football. Raphael repeatedly saved his side. His defence was very good.

There was a comparatively small crowd at Devonport to see the North and South match. It is a long way to go for a poor gate. But no doubt it is part of the new naval mobilisation scheme to have football matches first and cruises afterwards. The South won after a match in which individualism was rampant. Raphael gets his place against Kent, the champion county. Neither he nor Stoop were playing. Divers maladies seized both players, and Edinburgh is a long way off. Invalids must not take long journeys.

Woolwich Arsenal beat Notts County by five goals to one. Notts County are last in the League. So this does not mean that Woolwich Arsenal are going to the top of the tree in the League, as one would imagine from reading some of the reports in the football press.

Henley finances are not flourishing. In fact, they are in the condition of the national exchequer. There is not enough of them. On the current expenses of last year's regatta there is a deficit of £230. This, we are told, is due to the extra expense of booming the course. In addition, the income is not so great, as the house-boats are not so many as they used to be owing to the spaces on the Oxford shore being taken up by club enclosures. The Field comes forward with a proposition that will turn Henley into a gate-money meeting pure and simple. Arrangements are to be made with the Thames Conservancy whereby every boat that comes on to the course is to be charged at the rate of so much a boat, or so much for each passenger on board. I quite agree that people who go to Henley might reasonably be expected to give something to the maintenance of the course if they were reasonably treated by the people of Henley. But so long as the British public is content to be bled, and to pay the exorbitant prices that prevail during Henley week, I think the indirect taxation quite sufficient. The money to be raised for the course should be provided by those who are in and about Henley. If they do not wish the public to come to Henley, let them say so. The rowing men would no doubt prefer to get through their races without the presence of such large crowds. The whole trouble would be avoided by clearing the course of all boats below bridge by 12 o'clock each day. There would be no need for piles, and it would be much cheaper. The Thames Conservancy might consider this suggestion as well as the one contained in the Field. Both have an equal chance of being adopted.

A successful rebellion is called a revolution. I am not at all clear which of these words should be properly applied to the recent proceedings of the Billiard Association. That body went through some curious experiences. At one moment it was practically defunct. But, so far as I can understand, the meeting that was resolved on happy despatch became so affected by the prospect of the Association's prospective demise that it adjourned for a week or more. Any association was better than none. After a period of suspended animation, the Association has been put on its legs again as an authority in the billiard world. Some such authority is absolutely necessary, and it would be well if the leading players gave the Association their ungrudging support.

Stocks at First Irregular — Affected by Another Relapse in Americans—Very "Frenzied Finance"—Restoration of Confidence—Lame Ducks Helped Over — Monetary Outlook — Good Markets: The Funds—Home Railways and Kaffirs.

In the early part of the week a fresh break in Americans had an adverse effect upon the whole of the stock markets, and, although people here were inclined to smile at the fulminations of the "frenzied financier" in Boston and his declared intention to strike again, "suddenly, sharply, sensationally, and in a way that will produce effects upon prices and upon markets so much more destructive that the effects of the destruction of last week will appear by comparison as milk to vitriol," they had to remember that the first onslaught was extraordinarily successful, and that the top-heavy condition of the American market—where all were "Bulls" and none were "Bears"—was a great thing in the gentleman's favour. Happily, there is still a sense of humour left among the American people, and with very powerful interests operating against him, Lawson is now not much regarded even in his own native land. With Americans recovering, there was no reason why other markets should worry when circumstances were nearly all in their favour. The fall in Yankees caused two or three difficulties, involving forced liquidation of South Africans and Nile Valleys, but this counted for little, and with assistance the "lame ducks" were helped over. Although the Christmas account does not promise to develop much activity in any department, there is now an air of quiet confidence throughout the House (with the exception perhaps of Americans, which are more than ever an uncertain quantity), which will make for good markets in the new year. Consols have led a general rise, money being relatively cheap, and certain to be abundant within another fortnight; and Paris has been a strong supporter not of Foreigners alone, but to a marked extent of South Africans. The sections which seem to me to be the most promising for an early rise are Consols and other gilt-edged descriptions, because of the monetary outlook, Home Railways because of cheap money added to dividend anticipations, and South Africans because of the rapid progress of the mining industry. Americans might be left severely alone.

Money Rates Harder — Bank Reduces Supplies and Takes Control—Germany Still Buying Bar Gold—Year-end Stringency—Easy Conditions Ahead.

The long period of artificial ease which the Money Market enjoyed consequent to a large extent upon the heavy discounting at the Bank of bills maturing in the New Year has been brought to an end by the Bank mopping up a considerable proportion of the supply of floating credits, and loans over the night are no longer obtainable at 1½ per cent. or less, but command 2½ to 3 per cent. No relief is obtained by the gold arriving from South Africa and elsewhere, for nearly the whole of this has gone to Germany. The action of the Old Lady in taking steps to make her existing rate effective instead of advancing it is commendable, and when all has been said, it remains that we shall get through with the year-end demands in easier style than for some years past, that the stringency will be of brief duration and not particularly marked, and that right at the beginning of next month easy conditions will return. During the last two or three days of the month the tightness will probably be relaxed by the aid of cash borrowed from the Bank. Of course, this cash will have to be repaid, and in January a number of the bills mature which were discounted by the Bank. On the other hand, the Government will have to repay Treasury bills to the amount of several millions, and in spite of the impending Russian loan for £52,000,000, which may entail the withdrawal of a portion of the French balances employed in London, the range of money rates in the New Year is likely to be low. The Bank return for last week shows the customary out-flow of cash to the country prior to Christmas, the loss being £658,000, of which £566,000 went to the provinces. But as there was a contraction of £194,000 in the note circulation, the decline in the reserve did not exceed £463,000, which brings the fund down to rather more than £22,000.000. During this week the loss will probably be £3,000,000 or so, and gold shipments may be made to Germany, but there is nothing to worry at in this, because in the New Year the domestic money will begin to filter back, and receipts from abroad are steady and considerable.

Consols Firm and Buoyant—Tendency Upwards—Other Gilt-edged Stocks Sympathise—Foreigners and Paris—A Better Tone—San Paulo Loan—Japanese and Russians Steady—New Mexican Issue—Peruvians Better.

The feeling which pervades the gilt-edged section is quite hopeful and encouraging. Though at one time some slight apprehension became apparent as a result of the conditions prevailing in the American market, this influence only operated for a brief period, and the trend of values quickly turned on the upgrade again, and that tendency is more than maintained. Monetary conditions are favourable, and there is every probability of an increased volume of business among the high-class issues in this department within the next few weeks, induced by the distribution of much Government and other dividend money. On balance Consols are appreciably higher, and in company with them Transvaal Threes, the War Loan, Local Loans, and the rest of the British Government descriptions present a better appearance, while Water Board stock has come into favour again. In the Foreign group considerable irregularity has occurred. Among the Paris favourites Rio Tintos, for instance, were adversely affected by the difficulties of a couple of operators on that bourse who have persistently "bulled" the shares; but the effect was not widespread, and both Spanish and Turkish Unified, which had previously made a fair recovery, maintain their position well. Argentines and Brazilians, too, soon threw off the effects of this development, and are comparatively strong. The State of San Paulo, in the Republic of Brazil, is desirous of raising £1,000,000 in Five per Cent. Bonds, redeemable at par in thirty years by the operation of a sinking fund, for the purpose of paying off the cost entailed in the construction of public works. A quarter's interest is payable on April 1 next, and the instalments, being spread up till February 20, the price is practically reduced to 93¾ per cent., while the yield is about £5 6s. 8d. per cent., though dealers have added a slight premium. The "War" stocks are steady, Japanese descriptions being helped by the progress of the hostilities in the vicinity of Port Arthur as well as by a small amount of "Bear" covering; while the usual inspired support is reflected in the apparent firmness of Russian bonds, in spite of the impending new issues, which, according to the latest reports, is to make its appearance simultaneously in Germany, France, Holland, and Belgium. The new Mexican Loan has at last made its appearance, but applications for only about £3,086,494 are invited, the balance of £5,140,000, making the full total of 40,000,000 U.S. dollars, being already placed. The issue price is 94 per cent, or £194 5s. 10d. per bond of £205 15s. 2d., bearing interest at the rate of 4 per cent. The bulk of the proceeds are to be utilised for the retirement of existing obligations, and for the purpose of public works, including the modernisation of certain harbours and the exploitation of railways which, it is expected, will greatly facilitate a cheaper Pacific Ocean traffic and compete severely with the Panama Canal, wherever that undertaking is completed. This loan is quoted at a slight premium. Some optimistic utterances at the meeting on the question of a possible settlement being arrived at with the Government has induced more interest in Peruvian Corporation issues, which exhibit a tolerably firm appearance, though, as they have had a good rise recently, they cannot be called particularly cheap even on the settlement prospects.

American Rails Again Agitated—Sharp Spasms of Weakness—An Eventual Rally—The Lawson Campaign—Distrust of Yankee Finance—The Public Badly Scared—Sudden Contraction in Business—Atchison Bond Issue.

The American market has experienced another week of violent fluctuation. It was evident at the outset that the liquidation of the previous week had not exhausted itself, and several times selling was resumed in a manner almost suggestive of a panic. Towards the end of the week, however, owing partly to the less vehement character of the Lawson campaign, and partly to the action of powerful inside groups, a large portion of the early losses was regained, and on balance, as

Although the market has now grown more familiar with the attacks of Mr. Lawson, its surprise at the amount of influence which this speculator has been allowed to wield has, on this side at all events, not lessened. What attention, one might ask, would be paid in this country to an individual who spent some thousands of pounds in a violent and wholesale condemnation of our leading financial organisations, and of the personal character of the men at the head? Such action here would be regarded as a strong qualification for a strait-jacket. Yet we have to allow that it is just this flaring kind of campaign, inaugurated by a man who is admittedly far removed from a philanthropist, that has lately set all America by the ears. As I said last week, the American market, without any help from Mr. Lawson, was ripe for a fall, but the collapse which his attack produced implies a grave and widespread suspicion of Yankee financial methods and officials. It has been asserted in some quarters that the recent break in prices, while ostensibly the work of an individual, was in reality engineered by the principal controlling houses in New York, which, having parted with their holdings to the public, continued to wreck the market with the object of getting back their stocks at their own prices. Such a practice is not unknown in America, but on this occasion it does not seem to square with all the circumstances. Doubtless in the boom which has been going on since the late spring the public in the United States have materially lightened the heavy burden of securities so long nursed by the finance houses, but whether to such a large extent as is sometimes supposed may be doubted, for all along the rise in prices suggested speculation more than investment buying. In any case, it is common knowledge that a number of large bond issues are in course of arrangement in New York, and the leaders there would in their own interests hardly have consented to a plan which involved scaring the public out of the market. Accepting this view, it is easy to understand why the recent spasms of weakness in prices have alternated so quickly with spasms of strength. Those who control the market are still anxious to keep alive a spirit of buoyancy in order to allow them to unload securities in existence and securities about to be created, and hence they are forced to absorb stocks offering even at the existing artificial level of values. How badly they have been checked in their designs by the Lawson episode may be gathered from the severe contraction in the volume of trading in Wall Street during the last few days. On Monday week the total volume of shares changing hands was two millions, whereas by the end of the same week the daily record had shrunk to 800,000. So far as this side is concerned, business in Yankees has dwindled to the narrowest proportions, and some authorities predict a return to the state of affairs existing just over a year ago, when the sale of even a hundred shares was often a matter of negotiation. In the general excitement of the past week little attention has been devoted to influences affecting individual stocks. Perhaps the principal of these was the announcement by the Atchison Board of a forthcoming issue of $50,000,000 Convertible bonds, involving a corresponding increase of Common stock, for the purpose of completing construction and for branches and equipment. Doubtless the stockholders will consent to the Directors' proposals at the meeting on January 24, but so large an issue must materially affect the dividend outlook for Atchison Common, in the immediate future at all events.

HOME RAILWAYS FIRM—INVESTMENT BUYING—DIVIDEND SEASON APPROACHES—"HEAVY" PROSPECTS—YORK DEFERRED—"BRUMS" AND "LEEDS"—GREAT EASTERNS AND HARWICH DOCK SCHEME—LANCASHIRE AND YORKSHIRE THREE PER CENT. PREFERENCE STOCKS.

In the Home Railway department business has been greatly restricted. In spite, however, of indifferent traffics and the blighting influence of Americans, the prevailing feeling has been good, and there has been next to no offering of stock. The imminence of the dividend season accounts for the firm tone, and now that dividend calculations are approximately possible, it is not unreasonable to expect that interest in the market will soon reawaken—it may be before Christmas or it may be after. But the sooner the buyer comes in the better terms will he be able to secure. That is to say, the dividend outlook is, with one or two exceptions, satisfactory, earnings showing increases, and as present prices carry six months' and in a number of cases twelve months' accumulation of interest, and as moreover there is a good prospect of the sums to be deducted being recovered early in the new year under the influence of reviving trade, the market is a distinctly promising one for an early profit—one of the most promising, in fact, in all the House. Therefore, the speculator and the investor would be well advised to get in soon if they would go in at all. From the immediate point of view of dividends, the Great Western is one of the most fortunate lines. Public traffics show an increase of about £50,000, but allowing for under publication, of which all the companies are guilty in greater or lesser degree, the actual gross increase will be about double that sum. The accident in South Wales will be a special charge on this half-year, and an additional amount of Ordinary stock will rank. But working expenses are likely to be on a more moderate scale than has been the case for some time past, and the Company should have no difficulty in paying at the rate of 7 per cent., the same as a year ago, if it does not actually improve slightly upon that figure. Without taking count of this contingency, the distribution for the year will be 5½ per cent., giving a net yield of 4 per cent., which must be accounted as satisfactory. The North-Western is one of the few companies to report reduced earnings, but, allowing for under-estimation and also for economies of working, it is doubtful if the actual net reduction will necessitate a reduction of more than ¼ per cent. per annum in the distribution, thus reducing the rate to 6½ per cent., and making 5¾ per cent. for the whole year, upon which basis the yield is over 3¾ per cent. The North-Western is likely to lead in the coming railway revival, and in relation to the future there is the marked improvement in trade in the cotton district, while the pooling agreement with the Lancashire and Yorkshire in connection with the South Lancashire traffic is expected to be equal to ½ per cent. The Great Northern is another line which has had reduced gross earnings, but the gross decrease ought not to exceed £35,000 or £40,000, and the net decrease £25,000. As against this is the saving of £40,000 from the extinguishment of the permanent way renewals suspense account, and £20,000 more was brought into the accounts. There should be no difficulty, therefore, in paying 1½ per cent. on the Deferred stock for the year in comparison with 1 per cent. for 1903. The South-Western has a modest increase, and though additional capital ranks, and will absorb £20,000 of net earnings, these promise to be sufficient for the maintenance of the dividend on the Ordinary stock at 8 per cent. per annum, which will give 2 per cent. for the Deferred, the same as last year. The Great Eastern ought to finish up its half-year (against allowing for under-estimation of traffics) with £20,000 to £25,000 to the good, and as the system is being worked very economically there should be no difficulty in paying an additional ¼ per cent., which requires less than £20,000, and which will bring the half-year's rate up to 5 per cent. per annum, making 3⅜ per cent. for the year as against 3¼ per cent. It will be seen from my table below that the movements during the week have been mostly unimportant:—

North-Western stock has benefited by the agreement above referred to with the "Leeds" in respect of the traffic in the Liverpool district, and the stock of the last-named Company also shows some improvement, following upon the earlier rise. Great Central stocks hold their ground well. Great Easterns have hardened on "Bear" covering in connection with the coming discussion of the Harwich Dock scheme. Among the Undergrounds, Metropolitans have been supported on the electrification scheme, the trial run from Baker-street to Uxbridge having been made this past week. Central Londons are weak, some selling having been induced apparently by the Company's intention to ask Parliament again for sanction to carry out the circular extension by way of Hammersmith and the Strand. Prior charge stocks are very firm, but without much feature, with the exception of Lancashire and Yorkshire Preference descriptions, in which the dealings have been considerable, in anticipation of the consolidation of the various Three per Cent. Preference stocks of the Company. There are three different securities of this description on the market, and their consolidation would provide them with a freer market, especially in the case of the small issues of 1897 and 1899.

Canadian Railways—"Canadas" and American Affinities—Future of the Dominion—Regarding Trunk Junior Issues—Argentine Probabilities—Position of "Rosies," Mexican Centrals, and Southerns—San Paulos—South American Investments.

True to their old but sometimes awkward affinity with the American market, Canadian Pacific shares have suffered a reaction. The noisy and ridiculous fulminations of the engaging Boston gentleman sent Wall Street into a fright. At the previous carry-over "Canadas" stood at 138. On this occasion they were arranged at 132¾, but there has since been a recovery to 134½. The American outlook remains a good deal of a mystery, because the game of the Wall Street interests is not to be defined, any more than is the relation of Mr. Lawson, of Boston, towards them, and as they move more or less closely with Yankees—though, having good investment merits, they suffered less in the recent decline than the more active Americans—it seems to me that a speculative purchase of "Canadas" at the moment is fraught with some risk. The shake-out, however, will leave Americans distinctly more healthy, and, even though there should come another spasm or two in which "Canadas" may suffer, it is probable that early in the new year we shall have another "Bull" campaign in Yankees. My views as to that market are tolerably well known by this time. I regard them as too risky for the average speculator, but there is no denying the strength of the big Wall Street interests and merit, or the lack of merit, seems to be of little account with them when they are on the warpath. Not to elaborate the argument unduly, Canadian Pacific will recover to 138 and beyond, but whether soon or late is not at present to be said. The one clear fact is that as an investment the shares are safe; the earnings are on a large scale, and Canada is being opened out at a phenomenal rate; the 6 per cent. dividend basis can be easily maintained, and the chances are very much in favour of an improvement upon, rather than a falling away from, this basis. There is still nearly everything to make in Canada, and this railway, as traversing the richest agricultural and mineral parts of the country, has enormous possibilities before it. For my part, I do not see why the price of the shares should not—all in good time, go to 200. The Grand Trunk must participate along with the Canadian Pacifics in the benefits which will arise from the expansion of the Dominion, and the Pacific extension will in the long run be its best justification, even though some small sacrifices may be entailed pending its complete construction. The extension runs, not through barren, but though extraordinarily rich virgin soil with incalculable potentialities. This is the standpoint from which the Trunk junior issues should be regarded, and now that the management is earnest, intelligent, and enterprising the odds are all in favour of the man who buys for a lock-up. The immediate course of the market depends upon immediate factors, and the speculator must make himself acquainted with these—or, rather, must be in a position to anticipate them intelligently—if he would have a quick and profitable turnover of his capital. At the moment, the market is not very interesting. The latest traffic gives a gross increase of £1,425, when the market had looked for £8,000 or £9,000, but the market is quite irresponsible in its "estimates" of Trunk earnings week by week. In regard to dividends the most interesting stock is the Second Preference stock. To December 14 the Company reported a gross decrease of nearly £53,100, and to pay the full 5 per cent. for the twelve months on the First and Second Preference stocks it must have a net increase of about £30,000. Allowing for year-end sweepings—upon which the Company is always strong—the loss in gross earnings will probably prove to be small enough, but there remains the question of reductions in working expenses. For the June half, the saving was almost £100,000, and if the Company does as well as this for the December half, there will be no question as to the full 5 per cent. on the Second Preference. In all probability it will pay at this rate, and it seems to me that the position of a Company which, after suffering extraordinary ill-fortune during last winter, can earn a twelvemonth's dividend on its First and Second Preference stocks in the second half of its year is inherently more than a little strong. My table of movements during the week is appended:—

Dealings in Argentine Railways are on a poor scale. But Rosarios keep a good market, and the earnings are on a remarkable scale considering that they are going against very large figures a year ago. For forty-nine weeks of the year the Company is no less than £470,385 to the good, and the traffic outlook is as bright as ever. But having had their rise to over par, and bearing in mind their dependence upon and the uncertainty of the crops, "Rosies" no longer possess the speculative qualities which were theirs a few months ago, and the Deferred at 95 is rather different from the same stock at between 40 and 50, when it was first recommended for a purchase by me. B. A. Westerns are promised a run before long, now that the new shares have been got out of the way; and for investment there is no fault to find with Great Southerns, this Company being in a strong financial position, with nearly £150,000 advance in gross earnings since July, and certain to go on benefiting increasingly from the new works and extensions which are becoming productive. The Pacific is doing moderately well, and in its smaller way the Argentine Great Western is reporting steady progress, while there are considerable possibilities attaching to the Company's transandine interests. Among Mexicans, the stock of the old Mexican Railway have, as usual, been most in evidence. They reacted at first on an indifferent traffic—fancy figures are required to keep the large "Bull" operators in hopeful spirits—but have since been bought again, and I fancy that the dealing is very largely professional, there being nothing much to go for just now in the stocks. From the speculative point of view, Mexican Centrals and Mexican Southerns are in reality more attractive at the moment. In the Brazilian group the tit-bit—which happens to be at the same time the most substantial morsel—is San Paulos, which is worth looking at for investment (giving a 7 per cent. yield), coupled with a probable early rise in values.

KAFFIRS UPSET BY YANKEES—NOW QUIETLY CONFIDENT AGAIN—PARIS SUPPORTING—FRENCH KAFFIR TRUST—ANOTHER BATCH OF DIVIDENDS—LABOUR SUPPLY IMPROVING—A RARE CHANCE FOR BARGAINS—KAFFIRS V. YANKEES—A COMPARISON OF VALUES—PREMIER DIAMONDS—DEEP LEVELS.

At the last settlement one or two "lame ducks" who had been caught by the sharp relapse in Americans had to be helped over, and the liquidation of their South African holdings caused a certain amount of weakness in the Kaffir market. That, however, was only partial and of very brief duration, though those operators who have lines open in Yankees are still a little apprehensive concerning the early course of that market, and are wondering if they will have to sacrifice more good shares to make up further losses. If they would stick to their last, they would be spared these misgivings. The American slump left its mark upon Paris as well. The attack on Amalgamated Copper brought about a relapse in Rio Tintos, and this meant two or three small failures in Paris, with some offering of Kaffirs as well as Foreigners. Paris, however, remains a tower of strength in regard to South Africans. It lifted a very large number of shares off the market at the last settlement, including about 100,000 Simmer and Jacks, and now it is paying particular attention to Goldfields, and will follow this up with similar attention to the other shares dealt in on the Bourse. There is plenty of idle capital in France, and the French people have always been well disposed towards Kaffirs when the market has been buoyant and active—like the average Englishman, they do not care to buy when shares are depressed in order to hold them until the return of better times, though that is the best way to make money in mines, as in everything else. Their interest in the market will be greatly stimulated by the formation of a new French Kaffir Trust, with a capital of £1,000,000, a venture of unusual promise. Its shares are to be quoted in the Parquet official list—a distinction hitherto enjoyed by no gold share whatever. The Paris correspondent of the Financial Times says that, although the Chambre Syndicale des Agents de Change is not openly or officially interested in the promotion of the new Trust, it is generally known that official brokers are practically responsible for the formation, and important members of the corporation are subscribing to the capital in their private capacity. Hitherto the Agents de Change have been quite out of the running as regards market business in gold shares, none of which are quoted on the Parquet, and all transactions in them have been done through the Coulissiers. The creation of the new Trust is considered of great importance, for it is probable that the shares are destined to become a kind of official barometer of the Kaffir market in Paris. In London the management of the Trust will be in the hands of Messrs. S. Neumann and Co. The formation of this concern is a very strong "Bull" point for Kaffirs, and I think it ought to be better realised that the recent recovery in prices has been helped very materially by the miscellaneous support which Paris has given. As strengthening the good undertone of the market, the week has witnessed a batch of dividends which, while somewhat mixed—as they could scarcely help being with an insufficiency of labour, and the disabilities entailed thereby—are quite encouraging. Moreover, labour continues to come along in plentiful numbers, giving encouragement for the future, especially in relation to the Chinese, who now number over 19,000, and whose services will be available for three years. Thus it happens that what little stock comes on offer is quickly absorbed, it being recognised that the mining industry is now afforded a fair chance of making continuous headway, and that prices are at a very moderate level. Possibly there may be no material improvement before the turn of the year, the market being overshadowed by fears as to end-of-the year options, which mature on the eve of the vacation. But a man can make no mistake who puts his money into well-established and sound shares, and cares to wait a little while for a good profit, and for choice the shares of the land and finance Companies and of the more moderate-priced mines might be selected. New ventures, mostly to work properties in the outlying parts of the Eastern Rand, are making their appearance almost day by day, and the various "shops" are supporting, pending the development of a public demand. It seems to me, however, that our worthy friends the magnates might, with advantage to themselves and to all others concerned, go more slowly in this matter. If they do not, they will prevent the well-established things

Reference is made above to the ill effects upon the Kaffir market of the wild slump in Americans. It is not easy to see why a well-deserved set-back in Yankees should cause a non-deserved set-back in South Africans. The two are about as widely opposed as they could very well be. Both are speculative, it is true; but other markets are speculative, and yet they respond little to American influences. I do not for a moment believe that genuine holders of South Africans throw out their shares because Yankees happen to come over flat. It is the professionals, who must have a hand in something else, and this fact ought to be generally recognised, as it will serve to remove misapprehensions. When you buy a Kaffir share of the good sort you have something substantial for your money—a mine whose potentialities of output and of profit can be approximately ascertained, and a little calculation will show you what return you will receive on your money plus ultimate redemption of the capital. When you buy a cheap Yankee you are indulging in a blind gamble, and the events of the last year or two have proved also that a deal even in the dividend-paying group is attended with much risk, and that movements are controlled by anything but merits. Instead of being an overhanging menace to South Africans, the state of the American market ought to strengthen them by convincing people of the hopelessness of a fair run in Yankees, which fair run is furnished in Kaffirs. It may prove instructive if I place in close juxtaposition the present prices of the representative Kaffirs with the highest figures touched in the past—in 1895, the year of the great Kaffir boom:—

Mining values are gauged by speculations in which the imagination plays a more or less active part, or by cold calculations based upon the ascertained gold contents of a particular property. The opening out of a goldfield is accompanied by much speculation, as a result of which values are carried to an extravagant level. This was no doubt the case with Kaffirs in 1895, as it was with Rhodesians, Westralians, and West Africans in more recent years, and the inevitable reaction occurred. But for a long time now we have been in the second stage of the mining history of South Africans, and as regards a number of properties at least the anticipatory prices of nine years ago are now justified by accomplishments and definitely ascertained prospects. Further than this, it is only necessary to say that we are a long way from the top of the upward movement inaugurated a month or so back. With the one exception of Premiers, which have been taken in hand by Paris and have now advanced to within a fraction of 70, the Diamond group is disposed to go back, De Beers being especially depressed. The opinion is growing that with the many diamondiferous discoveries in other parts of South Africa and elsewhere, the Company will not be able to maintain its monopoly, despite its own belief in its ability to do so, and its lofty scorn of all other producers. It has been forced to reduce its dividend, and personally I should not care to be a holder of De Beers a couple of years hence at the latest. The Deep Level gold mines have received attention, and have remained strong throughout. Crown Deeps have jumped to 14¼, and South Nourse—a particularly promising purchase—to 3 3-16, while advances have been scored by nearly all shares in the group, including Bonanzas, which are helped by the dividend, although I regard the shares as unattractive, seeing that the property is almost worked out. For a purchase in this list, in addition to South Nourse, I recommend Cinderella Deeps, Simmer East, Simmer West, Village Main Reefs, Rand Victorias, and Jumper Deeps. My table is appended: —

The report of the Welgedacht Exploration Company for the year to June states that, generally speaking, the position of the Company to-day, with regard to the farm Welgedacht, is that the Directors are waiting the decision of the mining authorities on the question of whether they would allow them to alter the sites of their mynpachts, etc., should the engineers consider such alteration advisable. Every day brings further information as to the depth and trend of the reef, yet, if the Company were allowed and decide to shift its mynpachts, still another borehole may be necessary on the farm, which would mean further delay in starting shaft-sinking. The Directors hope that the investment in the New South Rand, Limited, will prove to be a good one. This Company is formed to exploit an idea that has been long existent in many local engineering minds to the effect that the Main-Reef series of reefs may exist at workable depths quite a long way from what is now termed the outcrop.

WEST AFRICANS FIRM—QUOTATIONS PRACTICALLY UNCHANGED —AN ENCOURAGING ATTASI REPORT—ASHANTI MEETING —MISCELLANEOUS MINES—COPPER DESCRIPTIONS LOWER —EGYPTIANS GOOD—MOUNT LYELLS.

In the Jungle the tone remains fairly satisfactory, and, though the animation during the past week has not been very pronounced, the leading descriptions have contrived to hold their ground fairly well as a result of the attention of the professional element, who are still working heroically with a view to rousing the public interest in the section. So far their efforts are fruitless, and I would reiterate what I have already said time and again, that it is useless for them to expect the outsiders to manifest a predilection for speculation in West Africans so long as the industry remains in its present state. The Attasi mine seems to be an exception to the general rule, for the reports indicate that quite a fair amount of headway has been made in the matter of development. The ore exposed approximates to 125,000 tons, of which 111,000 are of payable grade, containing an average of 11½ dwt. gold, an estimate which, as those responsible are at great pains to emphasise, has been arrived at after very elaborate and careful calculations. The mine has been opened to the 300 ft. level, and all shafts, winzes, etc., have been kept in thorough working order, while the reef exposed at the 400 ft. level gives every indication of permanency as a strong and payable body. Negotiations for the construction of a branch railway line have been unsuccessful, but it is proposed to equip a private tram-line in its place, and when this is completed it is hoped that the stamp and cyanide plant will be ready. Nothing of exceptional interest transpired at the Ashanti Goldfields meeting beyond the usual optimism. A cable had been received stating that the cyanide plant is in working order, and no difficulty is anticipated in getting from the Obbuassi section an all-round extraction of 1 oz. per ton. At the Taquah and Abosso gathering the general utterances were of the same cheerful character. My usual table is appended: —

In the Miscellaneous Mining section, Copper shares still monopolise the bulk of the attention, and after many erratic movements, generally finish easier under the lead of Rio Tinto, which have been adversely affected by troubles on the Paris bourse, arising chiefly out of the manœuvring in Wall Street. Though a full point to the bad, they are nevertheless well above the worst, and the same applies to Anacondas, which are widely affected in New York, and the rest of the shares in the group. Egyptians move less violently, though they still exhibit a fair amount of strength, being well supported. Mount Lyells remain fairly steady, being helped by the report, which seems to indicate that quite a fair amount of exploratory work has been carried out. It is said that after re-estimating the ore bodies previously reported upon, including the main body down to the 600 ft. level as far as explored, the new ore bodies revealed during the half-year give an additional 15,000 tons to the total tonnage estimated as available at the end of the previous half-year. Indians keep quietly firm, without any change of consequence, though some favourable statements made at the meeting served to help Champion Reefs somewhat. Among New Zealanders, both Waihis and Waihi Grand Junctions are easier, but in the Charters Towers group Queen's Cross Reefs strengthened on a rather encouraging cable alluding to the discovery of an ore body. Rhodesians Firm—Another Record Output—Individual Returns—Banket Description Dullish—Northern Group Devoid of Interest—A Chance for Wankie Coal.

If Rhodesia contrives to maintain its present rate of progress in the matter of monthly gold output, it is quite clear that within a short space of time no one will be able to cavil on that score. The November return is exceedingly encouraging, because it establishes another record, the aggregate being 26,183 oz., as against a previous highest of 26,029 oz. a couple of months earlier, and another phase of the matter which is undoubtedly encouraging is that for the eleven months the total is 7,764 oz. greater than the quantity recovered throughout the whole of last year. This served to influence Chartered shares, in which dealings have been on a large scale, and on balance they show quite a fair appreciation. With them the rest of the market continues to present a firmer front. Nothing fresh has transpired in regard to the alluvial discovery, but the feeling which pervades the department seems to be distinctly more hopeful, which is not surprising after a perusal of the following table showing the returns during the last four years:—

In regard to the individual returns of the various mines, it is encouraging to observe that the Selukwe has turned on the upgrade again, which seems to indicate that the difficulty arising out of the inaccessibility of higher-grade ore is being surmounted. The Wanderer, too, has made some progress, and the Morven property is advancing:—

* Fine gold. † Short run, owing to scarcity of water. ‡ Decreased yield due to higher-grade ore not accessible.

There is still a paucity of news dealing with the wonderful banket, and the tendency exhibited by the banket descriptions has been rather dullish, more especially in the case of the New Bankets, against which the imminence of the special settlement has operated detrimentally. There is, however, no doubt that within a short space of time a good deal of support will be forthcoming for all of these shares, as it is the avowed intention of those interested to twist them considerably higher. In the Northern group there has been an absence of sensational fluctuations, and prices have manifested an inclination to sag away slightly, though an exception has been Wankie Coal shares. These have shown quite a fair amount of strength, for the reason that the hopes which were at first prophesied in regard to its widespread use in the country, but which have hitherto been falsified in reality, seem to be on the point of being realised. Primarily the fault lies with the railways in charging a prohibitive rate for transportation, but the lines have now agreed to establish a uniform rate over their systems, for Wankie coal, of ½d. per ton per mile, to come into operation at the beginning of the new year. As this represents a reduction of from 20 per cent. to 50 per cent., it is anticipated that the area within which the fuel can be marketed economically will be considerably enlarged. Westralians Quiet and Generally Steady—No Change in the Public Attitude—Associated Management—Lake Views in Request—"Little Kangaroos" Idle.

The condition of the Westralian section remains practically the same as it was when I wrote last. The carry-over revealed nothing of exceptional interest, and the activity is of a very subdued character, owing to the aloofness of the public and the scantiness of professional operations. The former seem to prefer to dabble in Kaffirs now that they show a disposition to move ahead, while in the absence of any interesting developments the professionals are not encouraged to operate very freely. The tone is firmish on the whole, and quotations after moving within very narrow limits, show little alteration, except in the case of Associated, for which some active bidding occurred towards the close as the result of a report that the contemplated change of management refered to by me some time ago had at last become a reality. Northern Blocks, too, contrived to present a firmer appearance on the dividend announcement, and Great Fingalls moved up sharply to experience an equally smart relapse. Other leading descriptions where they have moved at all, have done so within very narrow limits, though Lake Views have been the centre of a great deal of interest as a result of a cable dealing with developments on the 1,600 ft. level, an ore body assaying 1 oz. to the ton over a width of 5 ft. being encountered. The "Little Kangaroos" continue idle and devoid of interest, practically the only lively spot being Bellevues, but these have gone back again on the statement that owing to the insufficient supply of fresh water, only twenty-five stamps will run temporarily, instead of forty. "Truth" Letter Box.

Correspondents will oblige by observing the following rules:—

Name and address, which must accompany all inquiries, should be written on the communication; cards are apt to be lost or misplaced, causing unnecessary trouble.

Anonymous letters will not in any case be attended to.

I cannot reply to inquiries by letter or telegram.

A nom-de-plume or initials (the former preferably) should be given if it is desired that the real name shall not appear in the paper.

Inquiries should be put as briefly as possible, plainly written, and numbered.

Communications received after Friday may not be replied to in the following issue. Delay may also occur where an exceptionally long list of securities is submitted.

I do not recommend brokers.

Government Securities.

Granton.—As the Peruvians give you a good profit you might take it. The negotiations with the Government for the settlement of the long-standing claims are not likely to come to an end soon, and by realising now you may have the opportunity of coming in at a lower figure later on. Peter.—One of the Chilian or Argentine stocks would be preferable. Safety.—It is impossible to hazard a date when Consols will touch par again. With the war over and the return of the Rand gold industry to normal conditions a good step would be taken that way. Tommy Atkins.—The new Japanese 6 per cent. loan is worth buying. It has only a limited number of years to run, but the interest is secured on the Customs revenue of the country, and there need be no question about the ultimate redemption of the issue. W. R. G.—Mexican Fives must be counted cheap at the current quotation with the country able to borrow on a 4 per cent. basis at 94 per cent. Chinese Fives are also attractive, being secured upon the revenue of the Imperial Maritime Customs, which are under European control.

Railways.

H. H., Bradford.—1. Norfolk and Western Six per Cent. Improvement and Northern Pacific General Lien bonds would suit. They yield close upon 4 per cent. Keep the Pennsylvania shares; the Company's prospects are quite good. Sheraton.—I see no reason why you should sell the Rhodesian Railway debentures. Meroz.—Southern Brazilian Rio Grande debentures, Rhodesia Railway debentures, and Mashonaland Railway debentures are a trio of fairly good class investments. Imperial.—Keep the Mexican Southern Ordinary for a better price. The Grand Trunk Thirds should harden early in the new year. The Second Preference is tolerably sure of its full 5 per cent for the current year. S. T. L.—Argentine Great Western Preference, Canadian Pacific Ordinary, San Paulo, and Rio Claro Ordinary would suit your purpose. A. B. C., Bideford.—The Home Railway market is hardening in accordance with my reiterated expectations. The present is a favourable moment for a purchase, and anyway buy before the new year and wait for the dividend season. In its favour the market has low prices, stocks full of dividend, improving trade, evidences of better relations between the companies (meaning the elimination of much unnecessary competition), and cheap money in view. Most of the "heavy" stock are promising, and Brighton A, South-Western Deferred, Great Easterns, and York Deferred are desirable. B. A. D.—The shares of the South Austrian Railway are not a good lock-up purchase. Exul.—Grand Trunk Third stock is not to be bought for immediate dividends. It is a favourite speculative medium, and will probably go considerably higher in the new year, because earnings will then be looking better. The stock is worth buying, apart from this, to keep for the development of the Dominion. C. H. A.—Chatham First Preference will almost certainly receive its full 4½ per cent. for the year; but the Second will have to wait.

Mines.

King William.—My view is that the shares will rise to 2, when Kaffir conditions improve further. At the same time they are not among the best, even of the medium-priced shares. Aerolite.—1. Hold for £4. 2. Good for £8. 3. Sell at £3. 4. Fair speculation. 5. Recent developments have, I understand, not been altogether encouraging. 6. Not much is made known here, but judging from the selling from Queensland, and the heavy fall in the price of the shares, developments are not satisfactory. The London offices are at 88, Bishopsgate Street Within, E.C. 7. A moderately promising speculation. R. H. A.—I prefer Bibianis and Sansus of those named, but I think you would do best to go for an early profit in Kaffirs rather than the possibility of a remote one in West Africans. Bags.—The most promising Westralians, are Fingalls, Oroyas, Kalgurlis, Ivanhoes, and Horseshoes. I hear good accounts from the Colonies of Sons of Gwalia, and poor accounts of Perseverance, Northern Blocks, Associated, and Hainaults. S. C. H.—Anacondas are too risky for people on this side, who are quite ignorant of the position, to have any dealings in. Muscle.—1. I should not care for a gamble in East Fingalls. It has recently been decided to reconstruct (the Company was only formed in July, 1902) with a liability of 1s. per share. 2. Golden Links are a poor holding, and you might sell. 3. Boulder Perseverance have indifferent prospects, and Lady Lochs and Paringas seem to me to be hopeless. Bards.—Sudan Goldfields, Murchison Associated, Great Boulder No. 1, Sansus, and Wankie Coals. Cavendish.—Rhodesia Coppers and Egyptian Mines are to be preferred. I do not recommend dealings with either of the outside brokers named. Go to a member of the Stock Exchange. Bute.—You might average on Rhodesian Bankets, which ought to go ahead again before long. Anxious.—You should hold into the new year at all events. You will have seen that the market is picking up quickly, and it would be a pity to get out now that good markets are in sight. Onlooker, Waterford.—The option promises to be a profitable one, but be careful with whom you place it. Cork.—Likely to advance before long and to give you a profit. Viator.—Balaghats are a fair purchase, and Nundydroogs are a better. Le Rois I should not touch. Mourne.—Nile Valleys are talked much higher, and there are strong people behind them. David.—I do not look for much improvement—rather the reverse—in Mount Lyells unless developments at the 600 ft. level prove encouraging enough to give the assurance of a big supply of ore in the near future. Nelson.—Porges Randfonteins and Consolidated Langlaagte ought to waken up before long. Better hold. R. F.—Do not join the reconstruction. North.—1. Worth holding in view of alluvial discovery and the Company's interest in the district. 2 and 3. No good. 4. Dubious. 5, 6, and 7. Fair speculative holdings, which ought to give a profit in time. 8. Poor; do not join the reconstruction. 9. Good to hold. 10. Same as No. 5. 11. Should be kept for the development of the copper districts of Northern Rhodesia. 12. Not promising. 13. As you have a good profit better sell—certainly if 2¾ be reached, and you will probably be able to get in lower later on. Greenhorn.—Prince's Estates, Johannesburg Consolidated, and Vogelstruis are best. I should sell Perseverance. Retired Pay.—I should not join the reconstruction. Apex.—I do not advise a purchase of Boulder Perseverance on recent developments and present indications. The shares are £1 each. Heracles.—1. You are within your rights in repudiating the contract. 2. The prospects do not justify you in paying a further 5s. You can claim your share of the assets. 3. Get rid of the Rossland-Kootenay shares. Ajax, Haymarket.—Rand Collieries and Barnatos should give you an early profit. Then you might invest the proceeds in the industrial. Aberdeen.—I should not choose Mount Lyells in view of the very uncertain outlook. Niekerks might be bought to put away for a time. C. G., Weston-super-Mare.—Hold for 2 and 5½ respectively. Sapper.—The shares are promised an early advance, and you might well wait for 4. The property is a very promising one. 2. You should average. Anxious Martha.—Do not put any more money into the concern. P. M. B. B.—Rand Mines, East Rands, and Goldfields Deferred. Radium.—Camp Birds and Waihis are good mining propositions, and Waihi Grand Junctions are a promising speculation. Jupiter.—Peak Hills stand at 15-32 and Venture Corporations at 2s. Both had better be sold. The others are hopeless. Vulcan.—Hold French Rands for 4, but sell Tati Concessions.

Mixed Investments.

Winter.—1. Ashanti Goldfields will no doubt recover ultimately, but not until the mines do better. If you do not care to hold on indefinitely, realise and try one of the standard Kaffirs. 2. North British stock should be good for a respectable improvement in the new year along with the rest of the Home Railway section. I am very hopeful as to an early rise in this market. Opifex.—1. Vickers might be bought, and Armstrongs are also a very promising selection. 2. I see no reason why Cape Coppers should be sold, any more than Tharsis. 3. Raphael Tuck Preference are quite a good Industrial investment, and Waterlow and Sons Deferred make a promising purchase. L. E. O.—1. I know no special reason for the decline, which I attribute to the dulness of business generally. It is possible that the dividend may be reduced further. 2. Nitrate Railways are promising, but you propose to come in rather late. 3. St. James's and Pall Mall and Westminster Electrics are worth buying. The first will bring in 5 per cent., and the second just over 5¼ per cent. Ella.—1.Not of much account, I fear. 2. A good speculation, but not an investment in the proper sense of the word. 3. Although not doing well itself, it owns some good patents which the other Companies desire. The shares have had a good recovery, and you might consider the advisability of realising. Kelpie.—1, 2, and 3. You are not likely to obtain better price by waiting, at all events not in the near future, and as you do not wish to provide for posterity you had better realise, certainly on Nos. 2 and 3. The Brewery dividend (4) will probably be reduced further, owing to poor trade. Veritas.—1. Great Boulder Props., Oroyas, Consolidated Langlaagte, Langlaagte Royal, and Chartered might be held for better prices in the next three months. 2. I should not buy Linotypes in view of the uncertainties of the situation. Shah Doula.—I should counsel the retention of Argentine Great Westerns and Grand Trunk Thirds. Read my remarks in this issue concerning the last-named. 2. The rise in Kaffirs has only just begun. I recommend Barneys, New South Rand, Randfonteins, and General Mining and Finance. 3. The stocks have for the most part had their rise, but Mexican Southerns are still interesting, as well as Cordoba Central Incomes. Dolphine.—Bradford Dyers Preference and Gamage Preference are worth buying as well-established Industrials. Stafford.—1. South London Electrics are promising. 2. I do not anticipate much advance in the price of Direct Spanish Telegraph Preference shares, which have had a fair rise recently. The shares are worth buying for the yield and a probable maintenance at least of the present figure. X. C. V.—1. Aux Classes Laborieuses are a fair Industrial. 2. Lancashire and Yorkshire Railway stock should go higher within another month or two. 3. The American outlook is very uncertain, but in good quarters a further rise is looked for in the new year, and New York Centrals are good enough to hold on to for investment. 4. The Kaffirs are safe to keep for a further advance.—John.—1. A bucket shop of a disreputable type, which sends shrieking messages about the profits you might have had by following its tips—which tips it omitted to send in the first instance. 2. I know nothing against the firm. 3. I regard Wall Paper manufacturer's shares as a respectable industrial. For a gamble, the least unpromising in your list is Harmony Props. Nemo.—1. Argentine Great Western Railway Preference Stock and Westminster Electric shares would suit, the yield being rather over 5¼ per cent. 2. It would be best to hold on to the Midland Deferred for the present. 3. Brighton A. Investor, Bristol.—1. Japanese Sixes are a good investment. 2. African and European Investments are a speculation 3 The Argentine railways are likely to go better. 4. All the Kaffirs are good, and keep for better prices.

Miscellaneous.

Cautious Investor.—Of their kind, I consider Wall Papers quite satisfactory, because the concern is doing well and the profits are good. T. E. F.—I would not recommend any dealings with the United Kingdom Savings Investment Corporation. Cigarette.—1. You should not be influenced by such an organ. 2. Not at all reliable. Go to an inside broker, and operate in the light. A. A. M.—I think you might join the reconstruction. Farrago.—I am sending you the name of the Paris solicitor, and leave it for you to decide whether it is worth while going to the trouble of recovering such a small sum. A principle is, of course, involved, and you are sure to recover something. Alpha.—They are quite desirable holdings, and you might keep them. M. Y.—The claims of Stephens and Henderson in connection with their cotton-future system are really too good. Leave the Company severely alone. Lieut.-Colonel.—I have not much faith in Anglo-American breweries, and though there is just ground for complaint, as you say, I do not think your suggestion will appeal to the directors. W. E. I.—You would be well advised to leave the so-called investment bonds severely alone if you desire not to risk your savings. The idea is being worked rather energetically at present, but the bubble will burst before long. Furniture.—It is rather doubtful whether you will be able to get out without a loss later on, consequently I do not regard it as a particularly desirable investment. Babu.—You might hold on to Bleachers for a little while, as the concern seems to be making a little more progress. On the strength of the last report there is no sound reason why Sweetmeats should be kept. The novelty which was at first so profitable is no longer remunerative, and, besides, competition is springing up. Blackpool.—Hold on to your Dunderland Iron shares. Do not be influenced by the utterances of the Industrial Share Exchange. Ireland.—The Nitrate Syndicate's wonderful offer appears to me to be extremely undesirable, and I would not recommend you to avail yourself of it. Sphinx.—The Army and Navy Dairy has no connection with the Army and Navy Stores, and you ought to refuse the offers unhesitatingly. Haughton, Bolton.—In inferring that these wicked bucket-shops live upon the weakness of "gulls" you are quite right, but, still, this does not help to a solution of the question relating to their existence. Wewitzer.—The concern is an unreliable bucket-shop, and ought to be avoided. Cave Canem.—It is; and if you value your money you will leave it alone. Ballurichard.—Though I cannot trace it in any of the usual works of reference, I am inclined to suspect that the concern is of the same nature as the other oil companies which "flourished" a short time ago, but are no longer in evidence. Yates.—In dumping Mr. McKenzie's precious circular into the waste-paper basket the recipient acted wisely. If everybody were to do the same such gentlemen would soon cease to trouble, but unfortunately the gulls are very numerous. Elmo, Worcester.—I have repeatedly warned readers against dealing with Cunliffe, Russell and Co., because they charge exorbitantly for bonds which, in many cases, possess no actual merit beyond the infinitesimal chance of winning in a lottery. They may be purchased for 30 per cent. to 40 per cent. less in London. Communicate with N. Keizer and Co., 29, Threadneedle-street, E.C., if you are intent upon indulging your fancy. M. J. H., Cork.—Many thanks for the literature and comments. G. Richards, Hove.—I have frequently had occasion to warn readers against the London and New York Exchange, and you will find it to your advantage to leave the concern to its own devices. Devereux.—I am obliged. Northerner.—There has been the usual delay in completing the place, but the prospects ought to be good. You might keep the shares. Speculator.—The loss is limited to the amount of deposit and no more. You must remember that the operations are merely gambles, on which there can be no recovery beyond the amount of "cover," and there is further the express repudiation by the broker of any liability on the part of his client beyond the amount of deposit. Douglas.—A reply will appear next week.

Industrials Quiet but Generally Good—Approach of Christmas Hinders Business—Telephones in Considerable Favour—Textiles Active—Satisfactory Bleaching Results—Woolcombers—Iron and Steel Shares Quiet—Trusts—Breweries—Slump in Salts—Lighting Descriptions Good—Hudson's Bays Up Again.

The approach of Christmas is scarcely conducive to any expansion of business in this department, which is essentially the small investor's market, and dealings are naturally on a somewhat restricted scale. On the whole, however, the tone is satisfactory, and with the turn of the year it should improve, provided that no untoward developments arise to act as a deterrent. During the past week perhaps the outstanding feature has been the strong demand for National Telephone stocks, on the strength of reports that the Company's earnings will show a considerable increase this year. Though the buying slackened off towards the finish and the earlier gains are somewhat neutralised by the indulgence in profit-taking, both the Deferred and Preferred issues are materially higher on balance, more especially the former. Throughout the whole of the telegraph division the feeling has been more cheerful, Easterns, Westerns, and Commercial Cables making some headway, while Anglo-American, after having developed a little further dulness, has turned on the upgrade. Considerable attention, too, is being directed towards Textiles, in consequence of the better outlook for the industry foreshadowed in the United States Government's large crop report, Fine Spinners, Coats, and Bradford Dyers being harder. Bleachers also improved, as a result of the more encouraging figures relating to the trading during the half-year. After appropriating sufficient for prior charges and depreciation, etc., profits amount to £98,980, out of which sum £15,000 has been transferred to a special reserve fund; and provision being made for the Preference interest to September 30, the net balance remaining to be carried forward is £36,859, or £9,200 better than on the last occasion. Woolcombers, Limited, otherwise the Yorkshire Woolcombers' Association, in its reconstructed form, is asking for £535,000 to enable it to acquire the assets of the old Company and commence operations as from the end of this year. The capitalisation of the new concern is £625,000, of which £325,000 is Four and a Half per Cent. Debenture stock, £250,000 in Seven per Cent. Cumulative Preference shares, and £50,000 in Ordinary shares, of which £210,000 of the Preference and the whole of the Debentures are offered to the public. The fault in the old Company was primarily over-capitalisation, aggravated by a period of depression, but as the total now is only £625,000, as compared with £1,965,000, the concern stands in a far more advantageous position; and though the sanguine expectations of the promoters may not be fully realised, the new Board seems capable enough, and ought to pilot the Company better than has been done heretofore. Iron and steel shares present a tolerably firm appearance, without material alteration in values apart from Hotchkiss Guns, which are helped by rumours that the Company is to be taken over by Vickers Maxim, which explains in some measure the recent buoyancy of the shares, though as yet nothing definite is known on the subject. The demand for Trust stocks continues on the same quiet scale, and a good many issues have made further progress, the approach of the dividend season helping matters. Among breweries, a somewhat sensational drop of about 20 points occurred in Thomas Salt "B" debentures within a very brief space of time. Though unmistakably significant, the fall is attributable to the forced liquidation of a deceased account taking place in a market not willing to absorb any large quantity of stock. The recovery almost to the previous level was equally sharp, and I do not think there is any cause for serious alarm on the part of holders. City of London issues remain depressed, and the whole of the market is disposed to be quietly dullish. A few losses occurred in the American group, but not of exceptional importance. Investors are quietly picking up lighting shares, and a fair number of improvements in quotations are noticeable, particularly in respect of Continental Unions, Commercial Ordinary, Imperial Continental, Gas Light and Coke, and South Metropolitan. Refreshment descriptions are not particularly buoyant, but Meat shares, after evincing a sagging tendency, improved slightly towards the finish. Hudson's Bays suffered from profit-taking at one time, and then spurted up sharply, and the general impression seems to be that they will go higher, favourable gossip relating to the Company's prospects being still indulged in. China shares, including Pekin Syndicates and Shansis, are also better, and despite the monthly revenue statement telling of a further loss of £701, bringing the adverse balance down to £2,975, Sweetmeat Automatics are firmer.

QUEER STORY.

HOW THE GLUMPKINS KEPT CHRISTMAS.

I DO not quite know how it was—whether the cold had got hold of his liver, whether things had been going badly at the office, or whether it was merely the pent-up bile of a disposition naturally cross-grained and saturnine now at length come a head and breaking out. Whether, I say, it was any one of these things or whether it was all combined, I do not quite know. At any rate, Richard Glumpkin reached home at three o'clock on the afternoon of that Christmas Eve in an unholy temper.

As if to add to his irritation, his latch-key, for some reason or other, would not act. With many muttered maledictions, he forced it in, furiously. It stuck halfway, and jammed. Then, for the first time, he realised that it was the wrong key—the key, in fact, of his office door.

"Deuce take you!" he stormed. "Always in the way when you're not wanted, and always out of the way when you are. Come out of that!"

He grasped and wrenched at it with such violence that the key broke off short in the lock. Richard Glumpkin said things that it is not well to repeat in cold blood. Then he rang the bell, savagely, and, because it was not answered in three seconds, he rang it again and again without intermission.

Jane, the housemaid, came running to the door in an apprehensive fluster.

"Why the —— can't you answer the bell, you jade?" demanded Glumpkin, savagely. "Am I to be kept standing on my own doorstep for half an hour?"

"If you please, sir——"

"That will do. I don't want to hear any excuses. If it ever happens again, I'll discharge you."

And Glumpkin, striding past her into the hall, tugged off his overcoat with truculent energy, and rammed his umbrella into the stand as though he might have been stabbing his worst enemy.

Then he marched into the drawing-room. Here he found his wife busily decorating the walls with holly and mistletoe. She was standing on a chair, disposing behind the pictures various sprigs of evergreen from a bunch that she held in her hand.

Richard Glumpkin stamped—like a naughty child. It was the impact of his foot upon the floor that first made her aware of his presence. She turned round with a start, nearly falling off her chair.

"What the —— are you scratching the paper and damaging the picture-frames with that beastly holly for?" he demanded. "Take it down again, this instant!"

"Oh! Richard!" she replied (she was a mild, innocent-looking creature), regarding her lord and master with deprecating eyes. "Have you forgotten? It is Christmas Day to-morrow, and I am just decorating——"

"Forgotten!" broke in Richard Glumpkin, with a withering laugh. "Forgotten that it is Christmas? Ha! ha! That's a good one! When everybody one meets, everything one sees, every letter one gets, reeks—yes, reeks, I repeat—of the hateful season——"

"Hateful season? Oh! Richard! How can you say such dreadful things?"

"I say hateful, madam, and I mean hateful," persisted Glumpkin, glaring at her, savagely. "Yes, you needn't look shocked. I mean it, I tell you. Christmas may be all very well for children and idiots, or for tradesmen's men, lamplighters, and such-like worms, who naturally nurse and cultivate the observance of a festival—a festival, good Lord!—which is endeared to their material souls by the pernicious associations of boozing and Christmas-boxes; but to the average, sane, sensible, grown person, like myself, what, I ask you, does Christmas mean? Nothing more nor less than an excuse for shameless bleeding and bestial feeding; for emptying one's purse and overloading one's stomach; for pretending merriment which one doesn't feel; for expressing hypocritical good wishes which one doesn't entertain; for giving trumpery, twopenny-ha'penny presents which the recipients would far rather be without. It is all a wretched farce—a hollow mockery. I am sick of it."

"Oh! Richard!"

"Don't 'Oh! Richard!' me, madam," retorted Mr. Glumpkin, with increased wrathfulness, working himself up as he went on. "I tell you Christmas is a sham—a snare—a delusion—a mere obsolete convention, which has long ago lost its meaning—if it ever had any. And this year I mean to make a stand against it. I won't be a victim to childish custom and hide-bound precedent any longer. To-morrow shall be observed in my house in a sensible manner—that is, just like any other day, which, in point of fact, it is," he asserted, growing a little mixed in his phraseology. "Like any other day, I repeat. Come! take down those absurd sprigs of holly and mistletoe at once! I won't have my walls made to look ridiculous. Take them down! Do you hear me?"

"Oh! Richard!" expostulated his wife; "at Christmas——"

"Christmas? Christmas? You have already heard my opinion of Christmas. I hate Christmas! Damn Christmas!" stormed Mr. Glumpkin, in quite an ecstasy of childish temper.

"You don't mean that, Richard?"

"Mean it? Indeed I do. Take those ridiculous sprigs down at once, or I'll make you."

His wife, seeing that her lord and master was not in a temper to be argued with just then, obeyed his commands without saying another word, though, like the immortal parrot, she thought a good deal.

Mr. Glumpkin stood regarding her with baleful eyes. When she had finished her task of dismantling the walls and had gathered all the sprigs of evergreen into a sheet of newspaper, he took them up, and, with venomous violence, threw the whole lot upon the fire, striking them again and again with the poker, as they sputtered and crackled in the flames.

"Christmas!" he ejaculated, scathingly. "I'll Christmas you! There, madam!"—turning to his wife—"that's what I'd do to all Christmas observances. Eh? What are you grinning at now?" he demanded, suspiciously, noticing that her face wore an unlooked-for smile.

"I was smiling," she answered, quietly, "because, though I was a little vexed at first with you for making me take down my Christmas decorations, it has since dawned upon me that, after all, when one comes to think of it, your opinion of this so-called festive season is really very sound and sensible. Grown persons, like you and me, do not enjoy Christmas, and it is sheer hypocrisy to pretend that we do. Yes, I dare say you are right, Richard, in calling it a hollow sham, a snare, and a delusion. It means an endless amount of trouble, expense, and forced merriment, out of which we get not only no satisfaction, but even a good deal of unnecessary discomfort. I am bound to say, upon thinking it over, that I admire you for having the courage of your convictions, and for making a stand against this stupid, obsolete custom. By all means let us treat Christmas this year as just an ordinary day."

"Oh, I'm glad you have the sense to acknowledge that," replied Mr. Glumpkin, still, however, looking rather suspicious, and perhaps hardly so glad as he asserted.

The truth was that, to a man in his present cross-grained humour, half the fun of making himself nasty was taken out of the thing by this smiling acquiescence on the part of the object of his ill-humour, and he felt very much as a schoolmaster feels who, having caned a boy viciously, and having imagined that he has hurt him, finds the urchin serene and smiling as though he had rather enjoyed it than otherwise.

"Not only have I the sense to acknowledge it, Richard," said Mrs. Glumpkin, cheerfully, "but I have the sense to act upon it. I will gladly co-operate with you in your sensible resolve. You may take my word for it that to-morrow—let me see, it is Wednesday, isn't it?—shall be observed in this house just like any other Wednesday, and——"

"It had better be, madam. It had better be; that's all," interrupted Mr. Glumpkin, with a portentous scowl, as he marched out of the room and retreated to his study.

All that evening he remained in the worst of humours. At dinner, he swore at the soup, the roast mutton, the apple-tart, the toasted cheese; after dinner, he swore at the coffee, and at bedtime he swore at his hot water because it wasn't hot enough, and, after sending down for a fresh supply, swore at that fresh supply because it was too hot. Altogether he was in such a temper that nothing could please him. But when, at length, he went to bed, mercifully for Mrs. Glumpkin he slept the sleep of the sluggish-livered.

Next morning, Jane called them early, as usual. Mrs. Glumpkin sat up, and rubbed her eyes, preparatory to rising.

"Whad's time?" murmured the sleepy voice of the semi-conscious Glumpkin, from under the clothes.

"Half-past seven, Richard. I am just going to get up."

"Har-par-sev'n. No need—ged up—yet. Not going busnez—'day."

"No, but we always do get up at half-past seven on ordinary weekdays, and we've both agreed to treat this as an ordinary week day, you know. Of course, you can do as you like, dear. But I shall certainly get up—on principle."

So saying, she jumped out of bed, donned her dressing-gown, and repaired to the bath-room, whence she presently returned, and completed her toilet. Then she went downstairs to breakfast, leaving Glumpkin still snoozing.

But he was not left long undisturbed. About nine o'clock, there came a thumping rap at the door, and Jane's shrill voice was heard, exclaiming:

"If you please, it's after nine, sir, and me and Cook wants to come in and make the bed."

"Bother the bed! You can't make it with me in it!" cried out Glumpkin, irritably. "Go downstairs again, and wait till I'm ready."

But he had been thoroughly aroused, and he now got up. In about half an hour's time he made his appearance at the breakfast table. He found his wife sitting in front of the gas-stove (with which the room was warmed), reading the paper. The uninviting remains of some cold kidneys and bacon met his fastidious gaze.

"I am afraid you will find it all rather cold and nasty, dear," remarked Mrs. Glumpkin, just glancing up casually from her paper; "but you see it has been waiting more than an hour."

"Why didn't you keep it hot for me?" demanded Richard Glumpkin, angrily.

His wife raised her eyebrows in calm surprise.

"My dear Richard, do I ever keep your breakfast hot for you on ordinary weekdays?"

Then she quietly went on reading.

"Well, I can't eat this disgusting congealed mess, anyhow," he answered, sulkily. "Ring the bell, and tell Cook to fry me some more."

"Impossible, Richard. Cook and Jane are both upstairs making the beds. They are very late already, and will hardly get the cleaning done before luncheon. Wednesday is their regular day for cleaning, you know."

"I don't care. I will have my breakfast hot!" declared Mr. Glumpkin, stamping his foot.

"Oh, of course, if you didn't mean what you said last night, and if you really don't wish to-day to be treated as an ordinary day——"

"There, that will do!" snapped out Mr. Glumpkin, tartly.

He realised that further argument on this point would lead to his own stultification, and would not bear pursuing. So he made the best of his cold breakfast in sulky silence.

As soon as he had finished, his wife got up and turned out the gas in the stove.

"Hi! What are you doing that for?" he said. "I want to sit here a bit, while I smoke my pipe and read the paper."

"Very sorry, Richard," replied Mrs. Glumpkin, "but on week days, I always turn out the stove between breakfast and luncheon, to save the gas. There is a fire, however, in the drawing-room. Now I must go and interview Cook." And she left the room, Mr. Glumpkin looking after her, and thinking things about her (for having taken him so literally at his word) that will not bear translating into language.

He took up the paper, and went to the drawing-room, where, having lighted his pipe, he sat down in front of the fire, and began to read. He had not been reading many minutes when his wife came in, seated herself at the piano, and began to practise finger exercises that quavered and semi-quavered and demi-semi-quavered with maddening din and rapidity.

"Hi! Confound it! Stop that!" cried the exasperated Glumpkin. "Do you think I can read the paper with that deafening row going on?"

Mrs. Glumpkin did not stop playing. She merely replied, raising her voice above the sound of the piano:

"I always practise for two hours every Wednesday morning."

"Confound it! Then I'll go to my study," said Richard Glumpkin.

Mrs. Glumpkin smiled, and the reason why she smiled will be made apparent by following Richard Glumpkin to his study. There he found the chairs upon the tables, and the coal-scuttle on the sofa, and the books from the shelves standing in piles about the floor, while amid them all, in a cloud of dust, moved Jane, her head swathed in a towel, her sleeves turned back to the elbow, and her skirts turned up so as to display an almost indecorous amount of black stocking, dusting, rubbing, scrubbing, with an energy that can only be described as desperate.

"Hi! Hang it all! What do you mean, girl, by doing this on Chr—ahem!—on a day when you know that I'm at home?" demanded her master, angrily.

"If you please, sir," answered Jane, in breathless jerks, never desisting for a moment from her dusting, "missus said as I was to go on with my work to-day as usual, sir. And I always turns out your study of a Wednesday, sir."

Richard Glumpkin beat a retreat, coughing and choking with the dust, and thinking many unutterable thoughts.

It was evident that there was no place for the sole of his foot in his own house on a Wednesday morning. He put on his hat and went out for a walk.

He walked for nearly three hours, in the course of which he walked off some of his liver and the worst of his temper. The unwonted exercise, too, created in him a healthy appetite; so that, when he returned home, he felt just in the mood to enjoy his mid-day meal. His appetite was further whetted by various savoury odours arising from the kitchen—a gratifying earnest of good things to come. He went upstairs, washed his hands, then came down and stood on the drawing-room hearth-rug, waiting impatiently for Jane to ring the bell.

In due course the bell rang. With a "Come along, Emily," Richard Glumpkin hurried to the dining-room. As his eyes took in the details of the repast prepared for him, his face fell.

Two dishes, and two only, graced the festal board. A cold shoulder of mutton—the remains of last night's dinner—and a rice-pudding.

"Cold mutton? Rice-pudding?" he ejaculated, scowling.

"Yes, dear. I always have the mutton cold on Wednesdays for luncheon. By the way, I hope you don't mind there being no potatoes. But Cook is always so busy cleaning on Wednesday morning that she has no time to boil any."

"Hem! hem!" growled Richard Glumpkin, clearing his throat. "There was something cooking when I came in, Emily. I distinctly smelt it."

"Ah, to be sure!" answered Mrs. Glumpkin, calmly, "You see, the turkey and sausages had come, and, as they wouldn't keep, I told the servants they might have them for their dinner. The mince-pies and the plum-pudding had been made, too. So I said they had better have them also. It will save the mutton and the rice-pudding, you see, and leave enough to be warmed up for our dinner to-night."

Mr. Glumpkin was too much overcome by his feelings to make any immediate reply. A Titanic struggle was raging in his breast—a struggle between cold mutton with principle, on the one hand, and turkey and sausages with humiliating surrender, on the other.

For a while, the event of the tremendous conflict—like that between the Russians and the Japs at Liao-yang—hung in the balance. But the turkey and sausages, on the top of a ten-mile walk, carried too heavy guns for the opposing forces, and cold mutton with principle abandoned its positions and fled.

Richard Glumpkin rose from his chair, and, Kuropatkin-like, putting the best face he could upon the situation, and speaking with assumed unconcern, remarked:

"My dear, I am about to ring the bell."

"To ring for what?" inquired his wife.

"For the turkey and sausages, with the plum-pudding and mince-pies to follow," said Richard Glumpkin, meekly.

Next day, Mrs. Glumpkin wrote a long letter to one of her many dearest women friends, which concluded with the following significant passage:

I do bless the day when my dear father taught me how to cure a horse of running away. His method was to let the brute gallop itself to a standstill, and then to flog it mercilessly and make it continue galloping until it dropped. He said he had never known it fail. Nor have I.—Ever your affectionate friend,

Emily Glumpkin.

THE TWENTY-FIFTH "TRUTH" TOY AND DOLL SHOW.

In all its main features the Truth Toy and Doll Show of 1904 resembled the previous Exhibitions that have of late years taken place at the Albert Hall. Once more had the interior of the building, which so well suits the purpose to which it is annually turned shortly before Christmas, been virtually transformed by the labour of many willing hands. What was but a week before an arena occupied by rows of fauteuils had been in a comparatively short space of time changed into one of the most densely populated provinces of the wide-spreading Empire of Lilliput. On the floor devoted usually to the requirements of well-placed concert-goers had arisen, as though by magic, an undulating table-land, punctuated, so to speak, by a series of pyramids which as usual were literally faced on all sides with closely-arranged rows of Truth Dolls. Enclosing the space thus occupied an elliptical frontier of cases of assorted Toys had been constructed, behind which more dolls—dolls in rows, dolls in companies, in battalions, in brigades, in army-corps—were symmetrically arranged, as though they were a garrison resolved to hold this outlying dependency of Lilliput against any force that the Emperor of Blefuscu could hurl upon its battlements. As on many former occasions, too, the central plateau was made to serve as a kind of citadel, within the limits of which were arranged in coigns of 'vantage those Truth Dolls of a larger growth, and a more famous descent, which may be said to have formed the aristocracy of the province. Here, highly placed, and far removed from the frontier lined by the mere "Tommies" of the Lilliputian Army, were to be found the crème de la crème of Dolldom occupying their dominant positions with all that serenity of repose which marks the caste of waxen Vere de Veres!—the Queen roses of a rosebud garden of dolls, to paraphrase the well-known line of the bard. As though to make the safety of these superior dolls all the more assured, the pyramids to which I have already alluded had been reared at intervals, like watch-towers, or links in the chain of block-houses with which Lord Kitchener held the veldt but a year or two ago. For these pyramids, too, were garrisoned by smaller dolls, all ready, it may fairly be supposed, to defend the aristocracy of their race with their very last grain of sawdust!

In strict accordance with precedent, also, the great organ at the Albert Hall had been well-nigh blotted out of sight, so completely masked was it by the fan-like trophy of Toys of all descriptions arranged in front of it. Here was to be found, in fact, a sort of apotheosis of the latest, the newest, the most elaborate playthings of the present Season. That screen of Toys was, indeed, as an enthusiastic little spectator exclaimed to the "grown-ups" who were personally conducting her through the Show, like the Lowther Arcade come to life again! Just as good Americans are said to go to Paris when they die, so to the imaginative did it seem that all the Toys of the now abolished Lowther Arcade which deserved preservation must have been spirited away to the Albert Hall when Mammon, in the eminently respectable forms of the partners in Messrs. Coutts and Co., annexed what had so long been the vaunted possession of the Tykoon of Toyland in the Strand.

Never, I venture to say, has the cream of the Christmas Toy market been more successfully skimmed for the delectation of Truth's little protégées. Could Caleb Plummer, whose anxiety to make the dappled steeds he produced for his taciturn employer, Mr. Tackleton, as nearly like Nature as he possibly could for ninepence, should certainly be accounted unto him for righteousness—could Caleb Plummer, I say, have taken stock of that marvellous collection of recreative masterpieces, he would assuredly have thrown up the Toy business then and there in despair. For whilst he was content to get as near to equine nature as he could for ninepence, he would now find artistic up-to-date toymakers ready to surpass Nature on its own ground, and to charge twice as many shillings for doing it. Great indeed is the revolution that has taken place in what I may call the Tackletonian business. Compare, for example, the rocking-horse of the Plummerian period—that stiff and awkward quadruped, with a highly-polished wooden epidermis, more suggestive of the imitation marble of a bathroom than of a Bucephalus, with bulging eyes and with his nostrils turned completely inside out—indicative of Blood!—compare this mottled abortion with the correctly-modelled steed with a real hide and perfectly natural attitude that now is put upon the market by every self-respecting toy-maker! Compare, again, the Tackletonian Noah's Ark, in which the animals were crammed in at the roof and had to have their legs well shaken down before the trap-door would shut—that prehistoric, topheavy Ark which, as many of us knew by sticky experience was not seaworthy when sailed in the bath-tub, and in which, so lacking was all sense of due proportion in the maker, the house-fly was only a size or two smaller than the elephant, whilst, as we all remember, the goose used to be so indifferently balanced on its too small feet that it was for ever falling over and involving in common ruin all the fauna within range of its beak! Compare such a Noah's Ark as this with the sumptuous kind which is now put upon the market, every animal correctly modelled out of white wood so that it can be sucked with impunity, and with the skipper and his family no longer shaped like idiotic tobacco-stoppers, but clothed appropriately in gabardine-like garments—old man Noah himself being even differentiated carefully from his sons by the addition of a patriarchal tow beard!

Compare again—but stay, comparisons are not only odious, they are in the present case particularly inopportune, for they are taking up, to small effective purpose, the space that could be more usefully filled with positive facts as to the Twenty-fifth Truth Toy and Doll Show. Very briefly, then, let me refer to the other more prominent features of the display of which I am writing. Tearing ourselves away from the Toy Screen, where in coruscating array were set out all the more expensive toys of the exhibition—the full-sized Punch and Judy shows, the woolly sheep that "Baa'd" like life; the appropriately topical bear that stood on its hind legs and beat, when duly wound up, such a devil's tattoo upon the side drum! Leaving also the dolls' houses, in which the entire house-front no longer comes open, as it used to, on a hinge, but which the prevailing love of realism has now furnished with a real front door and a practicable staircase; and the mailcarts, big enough for orphans to ride in; and the weird pantomime masks, which make all face of the enterprising children who wear them; and the musical boxes which play a répertoire of the latest popular tunes; and the practicable cannon, for the reduction of toy Port Arthurs; and the delightful dolls'-tea-sets and dinner services; and Army uniforms, for happy and extremely militant little boys; we move on, only to find ourselves soon brought to a standstill again by other fascinating features in that Show of Unending Pleasure!

Thus, turning to the right, our progress was at once challenged by a Nankin-Tower-like structure built—think of it, dream of it, little ones, do!—from base to apex of Tom Smith's Christmas crackers! Surely, since Hans and Grettel found that chocolate cottage in the wood, with its marzipan roof and its barley-sugar casements, nothing quite so utterly entrancing to the juvenile taste as that Tower of Bon-bons has been devised. And then, avoiding this "cracker" barricade, one found oneself brought up in front of a sort of entrenched laager formed of enormous packing-cases, provisioned with those toothsome wares which it is the life's purpose of Messrs. J. S. Fry and Co., of Bristol, and Messrs. Callard and Bowser, of Duke's-road, W.C., to disseminate through the world! And so, retreat in that direction also being cut off, one passed into a newly-settled district which a number of amateur "Fullers" had made their own by right of occupation. Of the marvellous confections which were here to be found I shall have more to say later on. For the present, also, I must reserve anything more than a passing reference to the portion of the plateau or tableland that was occupied by the Home-made Toys, the Models of various kinds—not forgetting another welcome consignment of Mr. J. Richardson's admirable toy engines—and the charmingly diversified groups of dolls dressed and posed to represent certain familiar scenes from Nursery Rhymes and Fairy Tales. Of many of the items thus comprehensively referred to I hope to speak more particularly in the course of this article. For the nonce, I am merely endeavouring briefly to describe, for the benefit of those kind helpers who were debarred by distance from looking on the spectacle that they had helped so appreciably to create, what they would have seen had they been able to visit the Albert Hall last week. I am anxious that Truth's staunch and faithful friends at Bagdad and Tokio, at Calcutta and Singapore, at Mandalay and Melbourne, should arrive at some notion—however imperfect it may be—of what people flocked to see at Kensington Gore a few short days ago. It is very unfortunate that I can at most suggest in a very perfunctory way what I should like to bring vividly home to the absent. I cannot reproduce the atmosphere of the scene I have so barely described. No one who has not actually seen the Albert Hall at the climax of a Truth Show can hope to obtain more than a faint notion of the spectacle—its excitement, its brilliant chromatic effects, its wide-spreading significance. But if it is hopeless to attempt to reproduce the scene as a bright, vivid, palpitating whole, it is at least within my powers to describe with some attempt at deliberation the many "mickles" that served to make up the indescribable "muckle" of the display. And this, at a length which I hope will not, in the circumstances, be considered too prolix, I will now proceed to do.

Though not inclined to carry respect for precedent to anything like an extreme point, I do not propose to depart from it in the present instance. It is my intention, that is to say, to deal first with the interesting personalities of the large Truth Dolls, on whose behalf size, cost, position, and, in many cases, character combine to plead. And of all these large Dolls, first mention may be appropriately given to those dressed and sent to the Show by Mrs. G. Barclay, of the British Legation at Tokio. For several reasons these dolls, and there were six of them, possessed a special interest. They were, for one thing, amongst those which, owing to a chapter of accidents, failed to get to Japan last year in time to be returned for the Show of 1903. Several parcels of Dolls met a similar fate, and it would be most interesting, were space available, to give at length the adventures by flood and field which some of these globe-trotting Dolls, if I may so call them, went through. "The Odyssey of a Truth Doll" could, I am sure, be made into a highly interesting narrative. In the present instance, however, the delay which occurred in the arrival of the dolls at Tokio has proved to be a fortunate mishap, for it enabled Mrs. Barclay, a lady who has previously done such excellent work for Truth's Shows, to deal with a subject steeped in actuality. Last year, had they come to hand as expected, they could not have dealt, as they now do, with the War at present raging in Manchuria. As it is, Mrs. Barclay had a chance of dressing the six dolls as Japanese ladies, who, grouped at a bamboo table, evidently of native manufacture, were busily engaged in preparing bandages for the wounded! Arranged with great skill, these dolls were seen—some winding the bandages, some cutting them in lengths, and all clad in a spotless white garb. There could be no doubt as to their vocation, for on the dainty white cap each lady was wearing a tiny red cross had been embroidered. It is not strange, perhaps, that these dolls should have proved one of the chief attractions of the Show. There was just that touch of actuality about their task which tends to make the whole world kin. It is interesting to know that these amateur helpers of the Japanese "Tommies" were dressed exactly as the native princesses and European ladies of the Legations are when they meet at each other's houses on given days, and on an average prepare 700 bandages at each Bandage-rolling "Bee." The ingenious little machine for rolling them is one of the results of the War with China, which Japan was engaged in a few years ago.

Of large dolls referring directly or indirectly to the Russo-Japanese War there were no other specimens, but current dramatic topics were suggested in several cases. Thus Mrs. J. A. Kennedy recalled a far from successful experiment on the part of Mrs. Brown-Potter at the Savoy Theatre, when, it will be remembered, the puff preliminary informed the world that a histrionic revolution was to be brought about by means of the "Emotional Gowns" that the heroine of the play was to wear. As a matter of fact, these "Emotional Gowns" were, I believe, worn for two nights only. But for Mrs. Kennedy's action they would have probably been forgotten by now; but it pleased this ingenious lady to revivify the notion by presenting at the Truth Show a large doll in an "emotional" dress. But for the fact that Miss Dolly Daydream, as this waxen exponent of sartorial emotion was called, was stated on the accompanying label to be typical of "The Dawn of Love," I, for one, should certainly not have guessed what particular emotional sentiment was expressed by her long green cloak with its silver lining. Nor did the fact that Miss Dolly Daydream was admonished not to wear her heart on her sleeve for every daw to peck at make the interpretation of her attire more facile; whilst the presence of the bird in question on an adjacent bough only served to darken counsel. There was probably something symbolic in the fact that the doll was wearing pink chiffon to an inordinate extent; whilst the natural bower in which she was posed was bright with the leaves of autumn. But what this something was, I must admit, I failed to discover. It is not at all surprising that so charming a musical play as "Véronique" should have inspired several exhibitors. Of the scene from Act 1, presented in an elaborate tableau by the Misses B. and F. Glave, I shall have much to say later; but there was another "Véronique," dressed by three sisters, the Misses Lucy, Adèle, and Edith Broad, aged respectively fifteen, thirteen, and eight, which made a charming picture with her golden hair and the apple-green dress she wore with such fascinating chic. A delightful companion picture was furnished by Miss M. Sinnett, who chose, with much appropriateness, the doll-like heroine of "La Poupée." Alesia, as dressed by her, also, in apple-green—a bewitching dress trimmed with roses—was, indeed, a dainty darling!

When I said just now there were no dolls other than Mrs. Barclay's which referred directly or indirectly to the War, I had for the moment forgotten the very interesting Chinese boy which had been dressed for this Show by the scholars at the Chinese Girls' School at Singapore. This was a doll that well repaid the closest examination, for it was easy to see what pains had been lavished on this lucky youth by the girls who combined to show the English children what a really nice China-boy should be like. I was especially struck with Master Ah Sin's pigtail. Clearly its plaiting with intertwisted floss silk, and the elaborate arrangement of the numerous partings shown in the arrangement of the hair on the boy's scalp, to say nothing of the fringe plastered down on his forehead, must have been a labour of love for many deft and nimble fingers. As to his rose-pink pantalettes, they were a dream! And the embroidered slippers and the chromatic richness of the loose brocaded silk tunic! Anything more delightfully "Chinesy" it would be hard to imagine; and anything less like the garb of the average English public schoolboy of about the same age it would, I am certain, be impossible to conceive. And I am sure Truth's sincerest thanks are due to Mrs. Lemon, the Head Mistress of the Singapore Chinese Girls' School, for that very "happy thought" of hers which resulted in the presence of so interesting a doll at the recent Show at the Albert Hall.

Another doll that met with numerous adventures between the hour it first left Carteret-street and the day it again arrived there from Bagdad, was that sent by Mrs. Langbridge, and dressed by her as a Mahommedan lady of that city would be. Here, again, it was clear, from even a slight scrutiny, that the greatest care had been taken in securing native stuffs of the right description for the various articles of attire, the electric-blue loose cloak, the black coif, the quaint head-dress, the Turkish shoes, and all the rest of it. I have not missed a Truth Doll Show since the first was held a quarter of a century ago, and I think I can confidently say that at no one of the series has a specimen of the typical Spanish Beauty been wanting. This year it was from Mrs. A. Auerbach that the inevitable Juanita came, black-eyed and black-haired, with red petticoat, lace mantilla, fan, and high-back comb, and all the other inevitable "properties" of the Seville or Cadiz belle. So, too, speaking generally, it may be said that at Truth Doll Shows the Continental peasant, like the poor, is always with us. This year none of the usual picturesque group was lacking. From "Yoko," who supplemented her 400 small dolls with half a dozen large ones, came another of those Norwegian country girls she dresses with such facility, and the front breadth of whose gown is always a triumph of art needlework. Equally clever in its way was her "Sister of Mercy," with coif, and rosary, and medal: whilst another of her large dolls, in knitted garments of much warmth, went out into the world excellently equipped to go through the winter, however cold it may prove. Notable, too, for her faithful rendering of a costume that most of us now know well, Miss Koch sent a Swedish Peasantess—the headwork on whose bodice was particularly elaborate; whilst that faithful supporter of Truth Shows, Mrs. A. B. Appleby, had evidently studied to excellent purpose the holiday costume of the Breton peasant girls when last she toured in Brittany. I know of few neater dresses than the blue bodice trimmed with black braid, and the white mob cap, which go so well with the quaint golden ornaments that are worn with them. But even more plentiful amongst the large dolls than Peasantesses were the Red Riding Hoods. Of all the nursery heroines, it is "Bo Peep" that, if my memory does not betray me, holds the record. In 1892 there were seven "Bo Peeps" coloured on the card—by which I mean, of course, placed in position on the doll-stand. This year I thought for a long time that this total had been beaten by Red Riding Hood. But, in the end, I discovered that the competition had resulted in a tie. There were only seven of the last-named characters. It will be for the judges to announce next week which of these were worthy of most commendation. For my own part, I should unhesitatingly place Miss J. Kittke's Red Riding Hood at the top of the class. True, the basket the latter was bearing to her grandmother contained no eggs—a pointed comment this on the present prohibitive price of new-laid ones; but, on the other hand, she was in one of the most "comfy" looking costumes you ever saw—a red cloak, a white overall, and a blue petticoat, all of them knitted or crocheted—and looking charming enough to touch the heart of the grimmest old wolf ever cubbed. Another Red Riding Hood that I should place near the top was that sent by Lady Fry—one of the six large dolls she dressed with such marked good taste—though I am not sure that Mrs. J. B. Brown's would not tie with her for second place, with her hat tied under her chin in the style now so popular. Two other "R. R. H.s" I must mention are those sent by Miss Burfield and Miss E. R. Godden, the basket of the former having been filled with rosy-cheeked apples instead of eggs. But perhaps the most charming of all the Nursery Heroines was Mrs. J. B. Brown's "Bo Peep." More than ever was I inclined to believe in the congenital idiocy of the sheep when I looked at this fascinating young lady. Surely no sheep which were not idiots would ever have been stupid enough to get lost by so charming a shepherdess! She was an Arcadian to the very top of her crook—which was bound round with ribbon—and dressed in the most dainty of costumes. A third large doll sent by Mrs. J. B. Brown, labelled Dolly Varden, was attired in a way not usually associated with the good Gabriel's daughter.

The names of the Misses Jacomb Hood will recur many times before I complete this article. You know those maps of the world on which all the British possessions are coloured red. Well, a somewhat similar effect would be produced if a plan of the Albert Hall could be prepared on which all the spaces annexed by the Misses Jacomb Hood were marked by a distinctive colour. For this year, these industrious young ladies, instead of concentrating their exhibits in one place, had secured space in various parts of the Show, here planting a fairy-tale group, there massing a score or two of small dolls, and, in a third place, posing a quartet of the large Truth dolls they had dressed. Thus one was continually coming on Jacomb Hood exhibits, until one wondered when the signs of their busy enterprise were to cease. For the moment, it is only to the large dolls dressed by them that I would refer. Occupying a prominent place on the central stand were the Four Seasons, dressed by Miss Jacomb Hood. At few Truth Shows has a set of Seasons been lacking. At none do I remember seeing a more effective set than at the Show of 1904. The leading characteristics of Spring, Summer, Autumn, and Winter had surely been thought out and combined with marked care and good taste. To mention all the symbols of the Seasons which were worked in would take up too much space. It is enough to say that Miss Jacomb Hood had apparently forgotten none of them. Robin Redbreasts and holly were used in the adornment of the Winter doll with admirable effect. Very pretty, too, was the picture she made of Autumn, with her wreath of wheat and poppies. Not far away was an artistic Juliet, dressed by the same young lady, in a striking robe of electric blue, and with a girdle of pearls. Near at hand, too, was a delightful Fairy Godmother who, thanks to the happy notion of Miss Louisa Jacomb Hood, has carried much joy with her wherever she went, for she was literally laden with toys and knick-knacks of all sorts, which had turned her into a sort of fairy Autolycus. It is not easy to over-estimate the joy that the advent of such a doll will cause in the hospital ward or workhouse school to which it will be taken. It was Miss Louisa's skilful and nimble fingers, too, which dressed the Olivia Primrose, and, by the way, as I omitted to state just now, were answerable for yet another of the numerous Red Riding Hoods. In dressing this doll, Miss Louise Jacomb Hood showed considerable sartorial daring, for she was unconventional enough to discard the scarlet cloak so generally associated with the heroine in question, and to attire her instead in a garment of a much more sombre hue. After this we shall actually expect to come at some future Doll Show on a Boy Blue who carries a pipe instead of a horn, and a Little Lord Fauntleroy whose neck is not encircled by a lace collar! Miss Jacomb Hood's "Juliet" reminds me of another dramatic heroine who figured conspicuously at the recent Show. I refer to Lady Teazle, dressed with much elaboration and care by Miss E. Wyvill. I noticed that fair critics were much impressed by the sumptuosity of the decorative adornment of the front breadth of this doll's beautiful gown. It was positively plastered with seed pearls. Great attention had been paid to accessories by Miss Wyvill, and Lady Teazle's fan, her mittens, her furbelows, her frills, and her flounces left nothing to be desired. Not for the first time did a masculine competitor enter the doll-dressing lists last week. On this occasion it was a boy, Master Gordon D Crabbe, who challenged attention with a spick-and-span young Jack Tar, belonging, if his hat riband chronicled a fact, to H.M.S. Truth. I am sure that Master Crabbe deserves warm congratulation on his success, for a neater and handier "A.B." surely never piped his eye, or spliced the mainbrace, or hoisted his slacks, or engaged in any other of those mysterious nautical exercises in which Jack Tars habitually indulge. Taut and trim, indeed, was he, with his pipeclayed lanyard and neatly fitting blouse.

I have only one thing to suggest about Miss Wrigley's Jack and Molly, known also as "The Twins," viz., that they should have changed names, seeing that Jack looked more than a little bit of a molly-coddle, whilst Molly had all the dash of a tom-boy. Mrs. W. Bates, in sending in the large doll she dressed so appropriately, showed her instinctive knowledge of what children really like by attaching to that doll's pinafore a pleasant little note to her prospective owners informing them that she was going to the seaside, that all her clothes would take off and wash, and that she had brought with her in a bag, inscribed with her initials "N. D.," what, according to Rita, smart ladies invariably call their "nighties"! Now I know as a fact that a doll thus furnished, as it were, with an introduction to its new little mistresses is always especially welcome. Even the presence of the initials "N. D." will set the children wondering whether her proper name is Nora Daisy, or Nita Dora, or, possibly, though it is to be sincerely hoped not, Nancy Deborah! Mrs. Kent, in sending her "Poppy" doll, adopted another plan which invariably gives pleasure. Her "Poppy" carried with her, pinned safely to her skirt, a cabinet photograph of herself, accompanied by the request, "May I be sent to the 'Elizabeth' Ward, please, at Bartholomew's Hospital?" [I may here parenthetically remark that although it is not always practicable to carry out requests of the above sort, attention is always paid to them when possible.] "Poppy," I may add, would be welcome at any hospital, for she had been dressed by Mrs. Kent with exceptional taste and care. The wreath she wore of wheatear, poppies, and marguerites was simply delightful! Equally effective in its way was Mrs. Kent's "Folly," with her quaintly-shaped cap of green and gold, not unlike an ace of clubs. As somewhat of an expert in the comparative merits of various dolls in the eyes of the girls who play with them, I should unhesitatingly say that it is a baby-doll, not yet short-coated, which commands the warmest and most cordial reception. Such a baby-doll, for example, as Lady Fry sent would very quickly be hugged and cuddled to pieces were it to be left unwatched amongst the tiny convalescents of a hospital ward, or the stronger and therefore still more destructive girl-scholars of a workhouse! Nor is this to be wondered at when I tell you that there were "grown ups" at the Truth Show who fell in love with the long-robed doll I refer to, and rhapsodised as only mothers can over the little innocent in white and old gold, with its bottle, its rattle, and those other mysterious articles which go to make up the modern infant's complete bag of tricks. A third large doll, contributed by Lady Fry, was a Kate Greenaway little girl in pale lemon and white. Lady Fry's baby-doll did not hold her position unchallenged, however. There was another of these mysteries in long clothes dressed by Lady Cooper, which, in pure white and swansdown, was what I once heard a well-known actor say the saddle of mutton was that he was engaged in sampling at a well-known restaurant, "a perfect dream"! From Lady Cooper also came two other exquisitely-dressed large dolls, one in red trimmed with swansdown, and the other with a bonnet of the shape we should associate with Mary Queen of Scots whilst we still regarded her as a plaster saint, and before we read Mr. Maurice Hewlett's "Queen's Quair." Miss Mitchell Molyneux, to whom long experience in doll dressing has now taught so much, was also represented by a trio of large dolls, all of familiar characters, but, none the less, all stamped with a style and a distinction that removed them far from the more conventional types they were supposed to repeat. What a dashing Merry Gitana, for example, was Miss Molyneux's—how chromatically effective, how full of the dash and fervour that we associate with the Esmeraldas, and Carmens, and Zingari of the sunny south! What a romantic "Little Girl Blue," too, she had sent to keep her gipsy girl in countenance; whilst it is difficult to mention her "Violets" without going off into a metrical rhapsody over her poetic realisation of the modest little flower it pleased her to make her third doll represent.

For reasons I cannot stay even briefly to discuss, there was amongst the large Truth Dolls an exceptional paucity of heroes to pair off with the heroines which clustered round by scores. Thus the few "he's" that were in the Show were, indeed, Jacks amongst the maidens! They had only to flutter their handkerchiefs to bring round them a bevy of fascinating damsels such as Miss Greaves's charmer in pink and white, that wore a wreath of roses with such fascinating effect; Miss Connell's dainty little maiden in book muslin and amber; Miss Pearce's fresh and breezy Fisher Girl, in the neatest of blue serge costumes; and the "Blue Girl" so prettily realised in the doll dressed by the Misses Rotherham and Miss Cuffe! From the place the Chinese boy from Singapore occupied he could feast his eyes on the charms of Miss M. Gardner's smart lassie in her early Victorian bonnet; a young lady of evident forethought and prudence, seeing that she had brought with her to the Albert Hall, in view of coming eventualities, her robe de nuit in a prettily-embroidered sachet-like bag.

It fell to my lot in assuring myself that I had missed no large doll of special interest and importance to emulate the upward tendency of the late Mr. Longfellow's flag-bearing Alpine tourist. I had to climb up amongst the dominant crags and headlands occupied by the dolls in the higher latitudes, and not without risk, thanks to the presence of a weak plank or the sudden descent of an avalanche of small dolls from the pyramidal heights I trod, were my investigations made. But let me be fair and admit that I was amply repaid by the dolls which my ascent made it possible for me to see at close quarters. Not being possessed of a telescope it was impossible to discern from the floor of the Hall the most effective points of the large dolls, which, for want of space upon the line, had to be more or less skied. But having once climbed up to the highest peaks, beauties were forthwith revealed of whose existence I had no previous adequate conception. Thus I could then note to advantage the charm of Miss A. Hill's "Bo Beep," the innocent grace of Mrs. Capon's Kathleen, and the demure loveliness of Mrs. Weidemann's "Cavalier's Daughter," who, if Lavater is right in his facial theories, must have been the most thorough-going little Puritan at heart. Thanks to my motto of "Excelsior," I was also in a position to appreciate the fancy dress of Miss Bull's elegant doll, with her rich brocade skirt, looped up round a waist not much thicker than a walking stick, the "smart" terra-cotta costume of Miss Ruffler's doll; and the graceful demeanour of Miss N. M. Hone's doll, which the long blue cloak, with its bewitching swansdown trimmed hood, that it was wearing, could not conceal.

But with all my pains it is certain that some other of the large Truth Dolls deserving mention must have escaped my notice. A last look round brought several additional entries into my note book. It revealed, for example, Miss E. H. Cave's doll in a long blue and white cloak and a Greenaway bonnet, and the simple girlish dress of pink and white muslin which Miss M. Gordon Laird had designed for hers. For a moment I was inclined to resent the fact that Miss Godwin's large doll had no shoes nor stockings; but then I, of course, remembered that in "smart" circles to be shoeless and stockingless is to be exceptionally up to date. But, even allowing this, I am afraid that the exiguity of this particular doll's skirts would be a fatal bar to any claim for fashionable notice she might be tempted to assert, and unless to be swathed in one's dress as though it were a bandage is to be ultra fashionable, Miss Godwin's large doll must be considered altogether out "of the movement," so far as her gown is concerned. If to be peculiar is to be fashionable, Miss A. W. Hancock's doll in her sombre grey and black deserved a more prominent position that it received. But at any rate it challenged attention by being altogether unlike any other doll in the Show. Miss Runcliffe's large doll might well have been christened "Rosy-fingered Dawn," so ethereally pink was her costume, a curious contrast, indeed, to Miss Radcliffe's doll in sealing-wax red and amber, which was its near neighbour. Miss Koch's doll was another harmony in pink, well worth attention; and to Miss Rose Shepherd's large doll belonged the distinction of having been the only one in the Show that was arrayed in a tea gown; whilst to Lady Constance Combe's doll in white and blue may advisedly be granted the distinction of closing the long procession of the large Truth Dolls which I have, in a somewhat disjointed and imperfect way, brought to the reader's attention. That I have omitted some large dolls I ought to have noticed is certain; that I have noticed some that might have been advisedly omitted is also fairly sure; but mistakes will happen, even at the most carefully conducted of Doll Shows. I can at best only plead good intentions and throw myself on the mercy of the Court.

At the Truth Doll Show itself, it is, I think, in front of the groups of dolls that the visitors linger longest. At the Hospitals and Workhouses it is the dolls and toys that become the children's own that are most highly appreciated. But so long as the Truth distribution is preceded by a Show, to which the public is invited, the popularity of the display depends largely upon the Groups on which such interminable labour is lavished by those who undertake to assist in this section of the Exhibition. Leaving for the moment the Tableaux or Groups which were designed, dressed, and arranged by those invaluable friends of Truth, the Misses Glave, who, unwilling to turn to account as prize-winners the phenomenal skill they annually display, have long insisted, in the kindest manner, on having their handiwork considered as "Hors Concours," I come naturally to the Group in which once more Miss May Streatfeild shows that patience, that skill, that good taste, that valuable sense of humour, which, though I have now seen them exercised for so many years, strike me with a feeling of intense admiration which no lapse of time and no repetition of the surprising effects witnessed suffice to modify or to check. Still do I find myself wondering, year after year, how one exhibitor, let her be as indefatigable and as earnest as she may, can prolong indefinitely the series of successes she has attained since she first, as a schoolgirl, achieved distinction in the line she has made her own. What that line is visitors to the Truth Shows know well. Miss Streatfeild year after year has given, in a series of admirably-arranged tableaux, what I may call a concrete version of some well-known nursery classic. There are few Nursery Rhymes of unchallenged popularity that she has not thus dealt with. In a similar way she has treated the leading contents of "Alice in Wonderland" and "Through the Looking Glass." On the same lines she has illustrated all the best-known "Learics" of the Book of Nonsense; the adventures of Shock-headed Peter; the story of the Man and the Mad Dog, from Oliver Goldsmith—the humours of those particular tableaux I always recall with especial delight—the quaint inconsequential nonsense of Foote's "Aldiborontophoskophorniostikos," the moving history of John Gilpin, and other well-known masterpieces of Nursery literature, too numerous to mention. And year by year, as the series has extended, have I wondered what next this facile young lady would present for London's amusement. Hitherto, fortunately, her selection, tact, and inventive powers have never failed her, and this season she has surprised us all by boldly attacking a children's book which one would have thought would have presented insurmountable obstacles to treatment in the Streatfeildian manner. This will be recognised at once when I say that her choice fell this year upon Charles Kingsley's "Water Babies," a story, or allegory, or fable, or morality, or whatever you choose to call it, which bristles with difficulties. But Miss Streatfeild has two mottoes, "Nil desperandum!" and "Thorough!" and never has she more fully acted up to them than in this present year of grace. The way in which she has, as it were, developed the fifty-six TRUTH dolls which were sent to her into what is virtually the whole of the more salient contents of Kingsley's fantastic story is simply marvellous. There really seems to be no incident of importance which she has not represented with all the minute attention to detail which is characteristic of a realistic dramatist. Beginning at the very beginning of the story, we see the hero, Tom, and his brutal master, Grimes the sweep, on their way to Hartover Hall, where, in an early set-scene, we are shown Tom standing amazed and admiring in Ellie's bedroom, down the chimney of which he has found his way by mistake. Then, discovered, as he soon was, we see him start on the adventurous journey in which most of the servants and retainers of the Squire vigorously pursue him. Off he races, and after him run the ploughboy, the groom, the gamekeeper, the milkmaid, the gardener—each a doll dressed for the part with a rare sense of characterisation by the clever Miss Streatfeild. How Tom finds himself at length in the dame's school in the village is depicted in another set-scene full of dry and quiet humour. Off he starts again, till he finds himself at that crucial part of his adventures when he comes to the river, and diving under the silvery stream straightway becomes a Water Baby. In another scene we are shown Ellie shrimping, and watch her as she also undergoes an ingeniously devised sea change, and, being beconed by the Fairies, becomes a Water Baby like Tom.

But this is by no means all that is shown us of Kingsley's narrative. Tom and Ellie in future share their adventures, and we see them successively at Peace Pool—a really surprisingly clever realisation of what the bottom of the sea may be supposed to reveal; At-the-end-of-nowhere, where we are introduced to Mrs. Be-done-by-as-you-did; to Mother Carey's Chicken; and so on, through various other quaint submarine experiences, till the pretty pair reach the Fairy Island, where, having made the acquaintance of Mrs. Do-as-you-would-be-done-by, they live happily ever after. This, be it understood, is but the baldest outline of the eventful history which Miss May Streatfeild has set forth with such surprising dramatic effect. The young lady in question possesses, in fact, as I have more than once pointed out, the dramatic instinct to a very great extent. She has the power of "thinking concretely," to use a suggestive phrase, and has fixed on just those incidents in "The Water Babies" which most effectively lend themselves to the kind of illustration she is able to give them. Clever, too, with her brush, she has painted a long series of backgrounds for the more important of her scenes. Nor will it surprise those who saw her elaborate series of groups that on the Tuesday before the Show Miss Streatfeild was busily engaged for several hours merely in arranging on the space allotted to her the series of figures and "properties" which she employed in her complete mise en scène. The space in question is that which for so many years Mrs. H. P. Truefitt filled with her dainty dolls, and when it was settled that the said lady could no longer render the TRUTH Show that active assistance which was always forthcoming so long as her health permitted it, what was rightly considered one of the places of honour was put at Miss Streatfeild's disposition by acclamation. Of how worthily she has filled it we have now had repeated proof, and if she had overheard, as I did, the praises called forth from visitors to the TRUTH Show by her skill and ingenuity, she could not fail, I am sure, to have been vastly pleased with the result of her untiring efforts.

Moving round the corner of the central stand, one came just opposite the fan-like screen of toys that masked the organ, on the group of another young lady who, since she first won a prize some years ago, has season by season developed the talent she possesses for making an effective tableau. Miss Grace Scholfield—for that is the young lady's name—chose this year as the subject of her spirited group, one which amply justified its comprehensive title of "At the Seaside." Her group was, in effect, a somewhat condensed and up-to-date version of that once-famous picture by Mr. Frith, the veteran Academician, known as "On Ramsgate Sands." With twenty-four TRUTH Dolls as her dramatis personæ, Miss Scholfield had, in fact, arranged a sort of still life representation of seaside amusements and amenities, of the truth of which to nature every visitor to a South-coast watering-place was well able to judge. Of all the common objects of the seashore in August, not one, I think, had been forgotten. We saw trippers picnic-ing on the beach, children paddling, bathers issuing from their tents, nurses doing plain needlework while their juvenile charges filled their buckets or collected shells. Girls and boys of a riper age were making the inevitable sand castle, toy boats were being sailed in convenient pools, papers were being hawked, and mail-carts trundled. Nor had the inevitable nigger troupe been forgotten. Miss Grace Scholfield's tableau revealed more and more items, in fact, the longer you gazed at it, and you at last left it almost fancying, as you did so, that you could sniff ozone in the air, so impregnated was the scene with what I may call a watering-place atmosphere.

A scene planned on an equally elaborate scale, but which unfortunately suffered somewhat in effect by the too straitened area on which it was set out, was the one designed by Madame M. Gilson, who had taken infinite pains to represent a "Recreation Ground for Nurses and Children Only." For the purpose of maintaining order amongst the latter, who were to be counted by scores, Madame Gilson, with the assistance of her friends, Mesdames A. Peyrot and G. Migot, had dressed three of the large RUTH Dolls as French bonnes, whilst a fourth large doll had been dressed as an almost aggressively English nurse by Miss S. Barker. These four domestics had all their work cut out for them, seeing that there was about fifty girls and boys under their tutelary care. For the proper display of all these juvenile recreationists there was, unfortunately, as I have said, insufficient space, the result being a congestion of dolls, which took much from the effectiveness of the scene. Thus there was scarcely enough space for setting up the croquet hoops, with which one party of the children was provided, and far from sufficient room for the trundling of the wooden hoops many of the little boys and girls carried in their hands. As for the organ grinder who had been admitted to the Recreation Enclosure to provide the music for an impromptu bal des enfants in the open air, he was positively so mobbed that he could have scarcely continued to turn the handle of his instrument, let him have tried as he might. But it was not difficult to imagine what was the effect that Madame Gilson had intended to produce, and perfectly easy to see how striking her tableau would have appeared if only more space had been at her disposal. But, unfortunately, the superficial area available for exhibition at the Albert Hall is not elastic, and with every wish in the world to oblige the exhibitor, whose plans were to a certain extent cramped and disarranged through no fault of her own, it was found impossible at the last moment to amplify one square yard into three. No doubt, however, should Madame Gilson again lend the TRUTH Show her aid a little previous consultation will prevent such an overcrowding as that which, to everybody's regret, has this year interfered with the complete success of what might have been made one of the most effective features of the exhibition, and which, even as it was, gave evidence of the effective skill with which it had been designed.

There was luckily no such regrettable incident in connection with Miss Pearson's "Fancy Dress Ball," in which no less than fifty of the small TRUTH Dolls were engaged. Miss Pearson has had much experience of the TRUTH Shows, and she knew exactly how much space she could reckon on securing for her dancing floor. She was thus able to set out her fancy-dressed dolls to the very best advantage, and a bright, lively scene it was that she arranged. Being another of those ladies that make "Thorough!" their watchword, she had even provided for her dancers a section of floor specially prepared for them with what looked like a veneer of parquet. On this, to the music of the Blue Hungarians, a minuet was being danced by some of the most effectively dressed of the dancers, whilst others, by that licence which surely the tableau-maker should share with the poet, seemed to be simultaneously romping through the Lancers. Amongst the more elegant of the worshippers at the shrine of Terpsichore (as "Jeames" would probably phrase it) we noticed a British Fox-hunter in pink, several dashing French cavalry officers, a Folly, a Pierrot and a Pierrette, a doll dressed as L'Entente Cordiale, several picturesque peasantesses, a capital chef, a pretty Welsh girl, and a conventionally-dressed Mary Queen of Scots. On a somewhat smaller scale Miss F. Brendon gave a spirited rendering of a game of "Blind Man's Buff," arranged so as to form a lively tableau, which Mr. Arthur Morrison, who has been complaining that we "grown-ups" are not nearly so childish as we ought to be, would doubtless have noted with warm approval as one of the ways in which "society" might show itself unconventional.

But it is about time we came again on the name of Jacomb Hood, and, surely enough, having passed the part of the central stand which Miss Streatfeild occupied so worthily, one quickly came upon several groups which bore unmistakable signs of their origin. All these groups were characterised by their artistic design and elaborately picturesque execution, and it is difficult to differentiate between the work of the three sisters. I may be allowed, however, to specially approve the tableau in which Miss Jacomb Hood had pictured the well-known incident in the story of the Yellow Dwarf as told in Mr. Andrew Lang's Blue Fairy Book, where the Princess Bellissima, walking one day in her garden, sees the Yellow Dwarf perched confidently on the highest bough of an orange tree. There is little else in the tableau, which is exceptionally simple and direct in its conception, but the little there is is of a very high class. The Yellow Dwarf himself is a trim mannikin with a gnome-like face, clad in a yellow suit, which seems to have grown upon him, so exquisitely does it fit; whilst the Princess is a lovely creature, well deserving to be called Bellissima. The corner of the garden in which the meeting of the oddly-assorted pair takes place was realised with admirable effect, too, the orange tree being an arboreal masterpiece. This particular tableau seemed to me, indeed, to possess an artistic merit of a higher order than any of the others sent by this talented trio of sisters, effective though many of those others undoubtedly were. Pretty in quite a different sort of way was "Ring a ring of roses, a pocket full of posies!" of which Miss Jacomb Hood was also the clever designer. Developing a somewhat similar notion, Miss Florence Jacomb Hood had a group illustrating the refrain:

> The mulberry bush, the mulberry bush!
> Here we go round the mulberry bush
> On a cold and frosty morning!

Very spirited is this arrangement and it is with evident gusto that the merry party is suiting its action to the words of its chorus. To Miss Florence also belongs the credit of the series of tableaux in which, with minute elaboration, the well-known lines of "Sing a Song of Sixpence" were represented. The scene that amused the juvenile visitors to the Toy Show most, was that in which as soon as the pie was opened the four-and-twenty blackbirds were depicted fluttering out from under the pie-crust in which they had been baked, without so much as turning a feather. But all the scenes were characterised by a quaint realism which proved very effective—the King in his counting house, the Queen in her parlour, and the Maid in the garden, being alike humorous conceptions which the children were delighted to recognise. The laundrymaid, by the way, must have seriously handicapped the blackbird that like a sort of Nemesis went for her nose, for that particular feature in the clothes-hanging doll was—probably with intent—of the sketchiest and snubbiest sort, and one at which it must have been most difficult for the avenging bird to get a good vicious peck. It was Miss Florence again who presented us with a concrete rendering of the strange diversity of tastes that was to be found in the "Jack Sprat" household, and a capital little tableau did she succeed in making out of what was probably a not uncommon incident at the Sprat's dinner-table.

In another part of the Show a considerable quantity of space had been annexed by Miss Louisa Jacomb Hood, for the setting out of four scenes dealing with the Yuletide of a hundred years ago—Christmas 1804 to speak by the card. These scenes dealt with the expected visit by Father Christmas, the opening of the Christmas stocking—a delightful tableau this of the children's bedroom, with their little beds already littered with toys and gifts taken out of what appeared the inexhaustible stocking. Then came the scene of the Christmas Dinner, the menu for which it would seem must have been devised in the nursery, seeing that all the pièces de résistance with which the table was spread were apparently cakes of assorted kinds, with a monster pudding, of course, in the place of honour. But it was the fourth tableau which charmed me most. "Going to Church" it was called, and Miss Louisa, with an excellent eye to effect, had set it out in the village churchyard—in itself a delightful picture of country life, with its moss covered lychgate, its time worn tombstones, and a cleverly suggested church as its background. And in this picturesque environment were grouped all the more typical of the parishioners, the old squire himself, the young squire and his fiancée, as well as Farmer Stiles and those thoroughly English children who, in a previous group of the series we had seen emptying their Christmas stockings with such pleasant excitement. Even now I have not finally disposed of Miss Louisa's exhibits, for in yet another tableau, perhaps the most elaborate and successful of all she attempted, she had reproduced on a small scale much of the pomp, and clamour, and movement, and excitement of a mediæval Tournament. To even catalogue the host of characters represented as taking part in it would occupy more space than I am able to spare, and my readers must be content to accept my assurance that all the persons and things that one expects to find in the Lists at such a time, Miss Louisa had forgotten no one and omitted nothing. Knights on gaily caparisoned steeds were "Having" at each other with their long lances in the most chivalrous fashion. High enthroned in the Pavilion sat the Queen of Beauty. Drawn up to their full height in order to "fan-fare" with proper effect, were the trumpeters; while looking exactly like animated knaves of hearts and diamonds, stood the heralds. On all sides flags were flapping, and pennants "frenetic to be free," as Browning puts it, "made one red stretch for home!" Visitors, with ample time to scrutinise, were able to note the scrupulous care taken to make the scene, even down to the smallest details, historically and sartorially, and chronologically correct. I overheard one lady rhapsodising over the quantity of pains expended on the housings of some of the knights' chargers and their pages' palfreys. For myself, the more I study such elaborate scenes as are now to be found at each successive Truth Show, the more do I wonder at the amount of industry and patience, and artistic knowledge, and above all at the infinite capacity for taking pains to which the many of the exhibited tableaux and groups bear evidence. It is simply marvellous. I am not at all sure that I have mentioned all the Jacomb Hood groups even now. At all events I have only alluded casually in passing to the scores of small Truth Dolls that the three sisters dressed in ordinary costumes. These were piled up in profusion on one of the tables, and the sight of them kept one wondering more than ever how thirty fingers and thumbs, however nimble and industrious—could have effected so much.

And now for what was really the bonne-bouche amongst the "Doll Groups"—the tableaux designed and produced by those staunch friends and supporters of Truth Shows, the Misses B. and F. Glave. Those who prove equal to the task of reading through my necessarily long annual descriptive articles cannot fail to remember in what superlative terms I have year after year written of the Glave exhibits. Time after time have I announced the attainment of a climax of taste and artistic effect only to admit that in due course the Misses Glave have again and again beaten their own record, and again and again surpassed the high standard they have so repeatedly set up. Last December, however, it was generally recognised that in the gorgeous tableau in which they dealt with the Coronation Fêtes of King Edward VII. on the plains of Delhi, a consummation of splendour had been arrived at. It seemed impossible to imagine any scene which could surpass in opulence of colour and dazzling effects the representation on a reduced scale of one of the most splendid pageants which even the Orient could produce. Never shall I forget the blazing brilliance of the saddlecloths that covered the flanks of the Rajahs' elephants which made such prominent objects in the Misses Glave's procession. A more magnificent "group" had certainly never been seen at any previous Truth Show, and I repeatedly found myself wondering in what direction its designers would turn for the new world they were eager to conquer. But I might have spared myself the trouble, for, as visitors to the Albert Hall last week quickly discovered, the problem presented was solved by the ladies most directly concerned in its solution in a way that it must be at once admitted was as effective as it was unexpected. Appreciating the fact that a climax of magnificence had been reached in their Delhi Procession, the Misses Glave, with a promptitude and decision on which they are to be congratulated forthwith proceeded to switch themselves on to an altogether different line, if I may use a simile with which railway travelling has made us all familiar. In other words, knowing the risk they ran of bringing about an anti-climax, they made a new departure and resolved this year, instead of eating visitors to the Albert Hall with any more chromatic triumphs such as they had often achieved, to go in for a tableau which should be quaintly picturesque and oddly interesting. And thus it came about that a considerable portion of the place of honour their dolls occupy as a right was, at the recent Show, devoted to the setting out of a scene which in its entirety was called "A Bit of Dutch." This implied that within a space of a few square feet we saw a sort of microcosm of the characteristic national life of our Dutch neighbours. Determined to be as eclectic and comprehensive as possible, the Misses Glave set themselves to embody in their tableau just those oddities of dress and manners which most strike the tourist in Holland. It was much, indeed, as though they had selected for their purpose just those Dutch types of which Mr. Tom Browne and Mr. George Haite draw and paint with such humour. As a background for the scene the tanned sails of a number of Dutch fishing luggers or "pinks," as they are called, had been utilised with a charming result. Blommers himself could not have painted a more appropriate background than that which had been thus provided. In front of it, posed in the most characteristic fashion were all the familiar Dutch types—the Schevening fishermen in the baggiest of unmentionables, the Zeeland peasantess with her elaborate cap and still more elaborate silver and gold hairpins and head ornaments, the Amsterdam gamin in his clattering sabots puffing away at a cheap and rank cigar, almost long enough and strong enough to serve as a mast for a canal barge, the farmer's wife on her way to market with eggs and butter and poultry, the country boor with his top hat of an antediluvian shape and a green "gamp," more like the furled tent of the Prophet that goes annually to Mecca, than the average umbrella of the period—these are only a few of the more prominent types that made up the general picture. How the Misses Glave revelled in the elaboration of its details can be readily imagined. I know my Holland pretty thoroughly, and of the odd head dresses affected by the wives and daughters in the various provinces I can bear witness that none had been omitted in the "Glavian" picture. The variations in the fishermen's garb, too, had been marked with the utmost care. Some of the dolls were irresistibly comical in appearance, and I doubt if types more humorous in an unforced way have ever been seen at a Truth Show. And not content with giving us this peep at what seems quaint and odd to us in Holland, the Misses Glave arranged and dressed a second tableau, in which they were able to give rein to their love of bright colour and pretty sentiment. This second picture was indeed a close copy in miniature of that scene in Act 1 of "Véronique," which, it will be remembered, passes at Coquinard's flower shop with its adjoining garden. And just as "A Bit of Dutch" was full of quaint humour, so was the scene from "Véronique" a sort of floral fantasy in which bright colours and fascinatingly pretty faces and daintily coquettish costumes were so delightfully combined. The mise-en scène had been arranged with the greatest care, and charming indeed was that part of the tableau in which we saw the fair heroine disporting herself in a flower decked swing. Both the scenes, as I have already intimated, are exhibited Hors Concours. Glad as the proprietor of Truth would be to award a special prize to the Misses Glave if they would take it, it is their wish that all the available prizes should go to other competitors, a piece of disinterested consideration which makes Truth's gratitude to the clever young ladies, to whom so many thanks are due, all the warmer and more sincere.

I now come to a section of the Truth Show which I always write of with a somewhat overwhelming sense of responsibility; for it becomes my duty to say what I feel to be entirely inadequate in eulogising those ladies who provide what is after all the backbone of the Truth Exhibition by dressing close upon four thousand small dolls for the Christmas distribution to the children in the workhouses and hospitals of the Metropolitan area. The simple fact of the matter is that familiarity with the task they annually undertake and carry through, so far from producing anything like an underestimation of their labour of love, leaves me each successive year more and more impressed by the amount of work they do. It may be remembered that a year or two ago I suggested, half jestingly possibly, that there should be kept amongst the archives at Truth offices a Register of Honour, a sort of Libro d'Oro, in which should be inserted, season after season, the names of any lady, say, who had dressed a hundred small dolls and upwards for a Truth Show, and really I am beginning seriously to think that some such step should be taken. It would at best be but a trifling acknowledgment of services which, from the point of view of our Truth Shows, are virtually invaluable; for let us praise, as one may, the taste and ingenuity shown in dressing, say, two or three large Truth dolls; and let us admit, as I for one am ready to do, that it is the "Doll Groups," which London flocks to the Albert Hall especially to see, it is still after all on the provision of the desiderated thousands of dressed Truth dolls that the ultimate success of each successive Show indubitably depends. The large dolls and the groups would go but a very small way towards meeting the demands made on Truth's resources; and it is the large reserve of small dolls we are in a position to draw upon which enables the Christmas distribution to be carried out in its entirety. This being so, it will be interesting to see who are the ladies who this year have dressed not less than a hundred Truth dolls. I find the list runs in this way, the figure after each name being that of the total of small dolls dressed by the ladies mentioned. At the top of the list, of course, comes "Yoko," who again guaranteed to dress no less than four hundred dolls, and who, by this time, I have little doubt, is already busily engaged in dressing the contingent she means to present for the Truth Show of 1905. This year the above total has also been attained by Miss B. Skinner, another specially staunch friend of the children. Four hundred dolls is also that lady's total. Then we come to Miss Ruffer, with three hundred and seventy-five; the Misses Jacomb Hood, a hundred and sixty-nine; Mrs. F. Comyns and Miss Pearson, a hundred and fifty each; Madame Gilson, a hundred and forty-eight; Mrs. Stern, a hundred and forty-four; Mrs. E. G. and the Misses Beynon, a hundred and eight; and Miss B. Finlinson, Mrs. Vickers, Mrs. Oakley, Mrs. Picciatto, and Miss A. E. Smith a hundred each. Thus the ladies above-named have to be thanked for dressing no less than 2,444 Truth dolls between them. I also found from the list that Mrs. Combe, Mrs. Pilcher, Miss M. Streatfeild, Mrs. E. J. Auerbach, Mrs. A. N. Carpenter, Mrs. A. Auerbach, Miss A. Lockwood, and Miss Mitchell Molyneux dressed four hundred and thirty more between them, so that the first-named total is thus increased to over two thousand eight hundred. But these figures set down here in cold black printing ink do not perhaps greatly stir the imagination. It is only those who understand what dressing a doll really means that can fully appreciate what is involved in dressing a hundred say, or fifty, or, for that matter, even twenty. For it must be remembered that the Truth dolls are, as a rule, dressed with a surprising amount of care. I have seen a doll "dressed" by swathing it in a strip of crinkly lamp-shade paper secured by a tin tack deftly hammered into the doll's vitals. But you will find nothing of that kind at Truth Show, where, in nine cases out of ten, I should think, the clothes worn by the doll can be taken off and put on with the utmost ease. This is notoriously the case with "Yoko's" dolls, every one of which is provided with five garments guaranteed to take off and on with equal facility. Four hundred dolls and two thousand garments! Try and realise for a minute what this means—what hours of cutting and what days of fitting, what weeks and months of persistent sewing! Fancy yourself shut into a room with four hundred dolls clothed only in an elusive tissue paper garment, and realising that every doll of this lot would have to be clothed in five well-fitting articles of wearing apparel before your task could be considered at an end. Why, the discontented pendulum would not be in it with you.

It is only in some such way as this that the task which is accomplished year after year can be realised. To attempt to bring home the facts to you by elaborately describing the hundreds of different costumes in which the dolls are attired would be useless. How can one be critical or analytic in a hasty scrutiny of some four thousand dolls? To what good purpose can I again praise "Yoko" for her thoroughness and compliment her on the striking chromatic effects she produced at the Show by dividing her 400 dolls into some dozen or so blocks and dressing each block in some distinctive colour? At the most I can make mention of some of the more distinctive features of the doll dresses which I saw all about me. Thus Mrs. B. Skinner was happily inspired to give each of her four hundred dolls a necklace of beads, and to dress all of them with bows and chiffons. A strong point in Miss Ruffer's dolls which I noticed was the up-to-dateness of their millinery. Never until I saw her dolls massed on two of the pyramids did I realise what an infinite variety of shapes and styles dolls' hats and bonnets could assume. Miss Carpenter's dolls, all dressed, as they were, in most comfortable looking worsted garments, went out into the wintry world well fortified against the worst that Jack Frost could do. Mrs. Picciotto varied the prevalence of dolls of the softer sex by mingling with her smartly dressed contingent a fair proportion of boy-dolls; whilst Mrs. Vickers gave an exceptionally bright and pantomimic look to the corner where her dolls were set out by dressing them all as sprites and fairies. Perhaps the most novel feature of "Yoko's" four hundred was the presence amongst them of a strong contingent dressed in funereal black. The effect was certainly very striking, though I am not sure that the innovation is one to be generally fostered. Mrs. F. Comyns, of Watford, has once more done much to make known the Truth Show in her own neighbourhood by holding a preliminary Doll Show, at which the dolls were on view, which she ultimately sent to the Albert Hall. In this way, since she held the first of her Local Shows, she has induced so many of her friends and neighbours to take an interest in Truth's annual distribution that she was this year able to guarantee the dressing of no less than 150 of the small Truth Dolls. In addition to this her daughter, Miss E. Comyns, dressed a large doll in quilted satin, which was much admired. Amongst Mrs. Comyns' small dolls, for which an excellent place was reserved, which was well merited, were a number of stylishly dressed young ladies, that looked particularly smart. Being in an experimental mood, apparently, Mrs. Stern took the trouble to dress the hair of a number of her small dolls in the ringlets which were not uncommon in the late fifties, and which rumour says will not improbably come into fashion again. It cannot be said, however, that the style is quite worth while reviving. "Tommy Atkins" is no longer the popular hero he was in 1902, when the troopship was in the bay and the band began to play, but that the Misses Beynon have not forgotten him is evident from the way in which the military doll recurs in the collection dressed by them. Both Miss Ruffer and Miss Lockwood paid special attention to the hats and bonnets their dolls wore; a matter about which Miss Mumford also took considerable trouble. It was a charming idea of Mrs. E. Auerbach to make each of her fifty dolls the bearer of a Christmas card; whilst, following her own precedent, Miss B. Finlinson saw to it that none of her hundred dolls went to its new mistress without a little basket in its hand and a pretty necklace about its throat. Each doll in the Show came more or less directly under my notice, and I find I have made numerous notes as to various points in which certain batches excelled certain others, and diverse ways in which ladies sought to invest their exhibits with exceptional interest. But I am already finding that difficulty as to space which is becoming chronic in Truth, and the most I can now hope to do is to mention some of the ladies' names whose work seemed to me to be worthy, for some reason or another, of special eulogy. The names of those kind helpers who dressed no less than fifty dolls have already been mentioned, and to these I am anxious to add those of Miss Sharpe and friends, the Hon. Mrs. Durant, Mrs. Bentley Rudd, Miss G. Bangham, Mrs. J. Wright, Mrs. M. E. Phillips, Miss D. Creagh, Miss Greaney, Miss V. M. Page, Mrs. Tonkin, Miss J. F. Walker, Miss C. Binfield, Miss F. Boughey, Miss D. Bradley, Mrs. T. Brendon, Mrs. Grant, Mrs. Connell, Mrs. Delgardo, Miss Moulton, Miss C. Dunston, Mrs. Falkner, Mrs. Kittke, Miss MacMichael, Miss Wilson, Mrs. G. Hallam, Mrs. Newton, Mrs. J. A. Marsh, Miss W. Poole, Miss C. Rivington, Miss J. Pridmore, Mrs. P. G. Symington, Mrs. D. G. Watson, Miss Wilson, Miss F. S. Lewis, Mrs. Weidemann, Miss Rivington, Miss Lathom, Miss A. Fenton, and Lady Fry.

And here I think I shall have to leave the matter. Gladly would I more emphatically express if I could the thanks that are due to the ladies named and to those to whom I have no space to refer; but I feel convinced that nothing I can say can really adequately convey what we all feel at Truth Office. Besides, it is not Truth's thanks that our kind friends are anxious to get. The prizes offered by the Proprietor can at most fall into the hands of but a few. But the reward which all will receive and all appreciate is the thanks of the children whose Christmas they will help to make happy, and whose New Year will be all the gladder when it comes owing to the hearty way in which they have assisted to make the Twenty-fifth Truth Toy and Doll Show and the subsequent distribution such unmistakable successes. Yes, it is not, after all, inserting their names in Truth's Libro d'Oro that will recompense those who have used their time and money, their patience, and good taste, their energy, and their ingenuity to make others happy. It will be the satisfactory self-assurance that they have succeeded in this endeavour that will be their recompense; for, as our bard reminded the readers of Truth last week:

"Of all the luxuries that man can feel,
The sweetest one is that of doing good."

Though there was no Home-made Toy this year of such pre-eminent importance as the Church and the Doll's House which are associated with the name of Mr. Frank Rawson, there was no falling off, I was glad to find, in the number of model toys and other home-made playthings. So numerous were these, indeed, that additional table space had to be improvised at the last moment. I more than once felt glad, as I carefully examined the exhibits, that my task was simply to describe them and not to act also as judge of their comparative merits. On certain points, however, there need certainly be no doubt, and I am sure that all who saw Mr. George Duncan's model of a piano-organ will be ready to accord him unstinted praise for an excellent piece of work. A close examination of the instrument showed how carefully he must have studied the original of his model, which by the turning of its handle was made to play several lively tunes. It was in charge of an Italian and his wife, and provided with an excellent pair of lamps, and its handle, I venture to predict, will have little rest during the coming Christmas festivities. For the third time the Stationmaster at Ben Rhydding has sent a consignment of his toy Engines, made, as he truly remarks in an accompanying letter, for use, not ornament. Mr. Richardson, in fact, turns out models of the most substantial kind, and I am glad to be able to assure him that the engines included in his first gift to Truth are still wearing well and serving to amuse those to whom they were so long ago presented. The number of engines sent by him this year was eighteen, all made, I may mention, after the stationmaster's long spell of daily duties is over. I will not say that Mr. Richardson has a friendly rival in Mr. H. Reynolds, but the latter has been impelled, possibly by his example, to send to the Show a well-made model of a Midland Railway express engine and tender, constructed entirely of cardboard and painted in the well-known Midland Company's colours. It was somewhat difficult to classify the "Fox Hunt" sent by Mr. Harry H. W. Sparham, who is clearly an artist possessed of no small skill. Very cleverly indeed had he drawn, painted, and cut out the horses, hunters, and hounds engaged in the chase of Master Reynard; whilst the background, showing a wide stretch of what seemed to be a capital hunting country, was sketched with considerable ability. I was most struck, however, with the natural and successful way in which the attitudes of the horses and their riders had been varied. The only matter for regret was the fragile character of the whole thing, which was essentially something to be looked at rather than to be handled.

Particularly quaint and clever were some groups of large wooden Dutch dolls, dressed and posed by Mrs. J. D. Brown, of whose large Truth dolls I have already written. These Dutch dolls, which were the quaintest oddities, had been specially purchased to illustrate some of the verses in a little book of rhymes called "Dutch Doll Ditties," published by Longmans and Co., who had given Mrs. Brown their permission to reproduce in a concrete fashion some of the pictures the volume in question contained. Thus one of the little tableaux illustrated the lines:—

She was a little wooden doll,
And ditto, ditto he;
He lost his head at sight of her,
And ditto ditto she.

A second, and even quainter picture, was that which realised the position of affairs suggested by this stanza:—

Sambo was a negro.
Though not a negro quite;
For though his face was very black,
His body it was white.
His hair, as well, was almost white,
Which made the people scoff;
So he scrubbed his face with Windsor soap,
But his smile alone came off!

But, alas! the end was sad, for finally we read:—

But later he his temper showed,
And ditto, ditto she;
And she walked off and left him,
And ditto, ditto he!

The Dutch dolls which took part in the accompanying tableaux were some of the oddest I have seen, and quite different from any others in the Show. From the lady who presented them (Mrs. J. D. Brown) came also two capital scrap-books, one of them mainly compiled by her little son, aged five and a half, and the other the freewill offering of a little girl of four—the youngest contributor, so far as my observation told me, who assisted in making the Truth Show a success.

A model, in the construction of which much ingenuity and taste were displayed, was that of "Prospero's Magic Cave," sent by Mrs. E. L. Cummins. The cave itself was made of some plastic material which, after having been modelled and hardened, had been painted very effectively. Inside the cave, which was furnished as a magic cave ought to be, were to be seen Ferdinand and Miranda playing chess in one corner, whilst in another stood the wizard Prospero himself, looking duly weird and uncanny. Outside, on the topmost peak of the cavern Ariel was perched ready to do his master's bidding, and possibly on the point of starting off to put a girdle round the earth before he could ejaculate "Jack Robinson!" or whatever may have been its Elizabethan equivalent. Another thoroughly up-to-date model toy was Master Norman Porter's effective representation of a scene from Captain Scott's "Antarctic Expedition." As the work of a boy of eleven the whole of the thing was well done, the arctic severity of the surroundings being suggested with considerable skill. Glittering with snow and ice was the scene where above the frozen-in Discovery flew the Union Jack. A well lined tent, a sledge laden with numerous cases of sugar and tea; sailors fishing through a hole in the ice, and, if I mistake not, a polar bear behind an ice-floe in the background, helped to give a realistic appearance to the landscape, if, indeed, the word ice scape would not better express the surroundings of the picture. A much younger competitor, Master L. Samuel, aged five, contributed the model of a garden, which, for so young a competitor, was not at all bad.

The practice of making copies of popular pictures continues to be popular, and several excellent results were obtained in this direction. Mrs. F. Green sent three such contributions, and one of these, "The First Sermon," after Millais's well-known painting, must be specially commended for the remarkable manner in which the small doll in the tableau resembled the little red-cloaked girl who is seen in the picture. So closely did the former resemble the latter that people, on first looking at it, rubbed their eyes in amazement. It almost seemed as though the doll had been cut out of Sir John Millais's original canvas, so like was it, not only in size and dress, but in features of expression also. Another popular reproduction by Mrs. F. Green was "The Old Window Seat," suggested by a picture painted by Mr. James N. Dealy. The text for this pretty little romance were certain lines, beginning:—

"In the nursery window seat
They played one happy day."

The "they" being a charming little girl and her playmate, a boy of some ten or twelve years of age, who, as they gaze together on the sea outside the window where they sit, exclaims:—

"And I will be a sailor, too,
And sail the stormy sea!"

"And what am I to do at home when you are gone?" asks the girl. This is the episode which Mrs. Green's doll picture illustrated. In the wide-cushioned window-seat were seen the girl and boy gazing out at the distant sea. Their toys and books were heaped up beside them or scattered on the floor at their feet. Naturally, as we looked at the pretty pair, we wondered what answer the future would give to the girl's question; and we were pleased to note that the reply had been furnished in a supplementary stanza. For "after long years had passed," it seems they again stood in the window-seat and gazed "on the bay, the ships,,and the wheat." Then, as "he" bends over her golden head, "she" lifts her eyes of blue

"The nursery land is best, he said, Because it gave me you."

Surely a pretty and pathetic little idyll, and one that, thus sympathetically told, can hardly fail to delight the children amongst whose corporate possessions "The Old Window Seat" is now included. The third of Mrs. Green's pictorial reproductions was entitled "Carriage Folk," and consisted mainly of a pretty little girl-doll picturesquely posed in a wheelbarrow, as originally painted by Fräulein Menda.

Let me congratulate Miss M. M. Bayly on a reproduction of a much more widely known oil painting, the "Harmony" which was one of the earliest successes of Mr. Frank Dicksee, the R.A. This reproduction was a doll-picture of the most elaborate and finished kind. The utmost care had been lavished on the organ and its accessories, and the stained glass window in the background was most skilfully suggested. The figures of the damsel sitting at the keyboard and her attendant lover were represented by two dolls dressed in close imitation of the pair which appear in the original painting. Still more full of detail was Mrs. Foulger's reproduction of Mr. Stanhope Forbes' well-known picture, "The Health of the Bride," in which a crowd of guests sitting with the newly-married pair round a well-spread Cornish table recalled all the more prominent figures to be found in the original painting. Coming to the more miscellaneous of the home-made Toys, etc., let me say how warmly welcomed the soft worsted balls made by "S. B." will be at the hospital whither they have been sent. Such balls as these can be tossed about even by children obliged to lie prone in their cots, and cannot possibly do any damage. The neatly-made purses sent by Mrs. F. Crabb will come in most usefully for the new sixpences which the workhouse children will receive in due course. And Miss L. Chapman may be assured that the six little dolls' bedsteads made and contributed by her will give more pleasure to their recipients than Toys of a much more elaborate and expensive kind. Experience shows that the delight felt by a small child in dressing a doll is only surpassed by the charm of undressing it and putting it to "by-by."

The presented dolls were, as usual, of all sorts and sizes. Exceptional interest attached to the real Russian specimens sent from Moscow by Miss Judge and Miss Hastie, whilst Miss Potter, of Pau, again sent several fascinating specimens of the French poupée. Very quaint were the tiny native dolls, dressed in national costumes and sent from Arequipa, in Peru, by Mr. G. Barker. Most interesting was the doll sent by Mrs. Baynes, dressed as a Queen's District Nurse, her garments being exact models of those worn by the real nurses. In the bag this doll carried I found, on investigation, a supply of lint, plaster, etc., with scissors, and even a threepenny bit thoughtfully added by Mrs. Baynes to her outfit in order to pay her tram fare to her new home! Miss Richards also contributed a capital-dressed doll, and Miss F. M. Page one charmingly arrayed in pink, and provided with a sensible carte de visite in the shape of her own photograph. There were two very comical dolls labelled "East and West," typified by a "Tommy" with exceptionally large feet and a Mandalay damsel, who, to say the least, appeared to be a tremendous flirt, but I know not whom to thank for this odd couple, as they were sent anonymously. Miss Jameson's Imperial Russian nurse—Prascovia, as she would be called in Russia—was also a very popular exhibit, and from the same lady came a most comely Donna Elvira. Some pretty dolls from Mrs. G. Beetham also merit a special line of commendation, and these, I think, virtually complete the list of presented dolls to which I wish to call attention.

There was fortunately a good number of Scrap Books sent in. Miss G. Rawson, not by any means for the first time, set an excellent example by contributing fifty, whilst a further supply, in addition to several already referred to, was received from Lady Constance Shaw Lefevre, Miss E. Thompson, Miss C. Dunston, Miss K. Howard, Mrs. E. Oakley, Miss L. Hurst, Miss Martin-Edwards, and "Ethel and Marjorie." Nor must I forget that Lucy, Albert, and Harold Auerbach sent no less than a dozen of these always welcome books.

The number of contributors of Home-made Sweets showed a considerable increase on the total of last year, but there is still room for the further development of what might, I am sure, be made a more popular section of the Truth Show. Of the more prominent competitors Miss E. C. Baker and Miss J. F. Walker contributed the largest collections. From the former clever young lady came no less than twenty-four boxes, twelve of which were filled with mixed creams, and twelve with peppermint creams. Miss Walker's contribution was on a similar extensive scale, and Miss Bucknall also distinguished herself in this department. That there will be some difficulty in deciding as to the relative merits of the various amateur "Fullers" is certain, for there was not one of the judges who was ready and willing, even at the bidding of duty, to taste with critical intent the many sorts of home-made confections submitted for competition. I believe it was ultimately decided to attach a tasting girl to the judge's committee to assist as an expert assessor. Meanwhile if appearances were not deceptive, there can be little doubt about the excellence of the "sweet meats" sent by the young ladies already mentioned, and by such skilful manipulators of sugar in its daintiest forms as Miss W. Sayer, Mrs. Foulger, Miss Bucknall, and Miss F. M. Williams,

One of the pleasantest of the many paragraphs I write annually on the Truth Shows is that in which I thank, on behalf of the 29,000 interested children, all those who have so willingly helped us in making the Truth Exhibition and Distribution an unequivocal success. The ladies who have worked so indefatigably at doll-dressing I have already thanked. Let me now in a similar way thank all the contributors and competitors, masculine as well as feminine, who have assisted in the good work we had in hand. To the kind friends who have sent donations to the Toy Fund I would also express the children's gratitude. Nor can I forget the efforts of those who so generously volunteered to provide the Truth Show with that musical programme which always proves so popular. As soon as the dates of the Show were settled Mr. H. C. Tonking, in the most willing way, volunteered his services, and as a result duly gave a series of organ recitals which were most thoroughly enjoyed. He selected a programme which apparently gave universal satisfaction, and greatly enhanced the pleasure of many of the visitors who after strolling through the Show were only too happy to be able to sit in a comfortable stall and hear such an excellent selection of music. Mr. Tonking deserves, and is hereby presented with, Truth's sincerest thanks. To Mr. S. M. Jenkins, also, who brought his Mandoline Band—the largest in the world—on Thursday evening to the Albert Hall, Truth's acknowledgments are most assuredly due. The concert in which his numerous instrumentalists took part was a most enjoyable one, and was greatly appreciated. It is once more my pleasing duty to thank my printers for the generous way in which they did all the necessary printing for the recent Show without charge, thus in effect, making a handsome donation to the Truth Toy Fund. To the Metropolitan District Railway for displaying posters of the Show at their stations, Truth's thanks are also gratefully accorded. In short I would include every one who helped in any way, either with their time or their money, or both, in the thanks which are undoubtedly due. Need I say that amongst those thus included, are the ladies who worked so hard at arranging the dolls and toys at the Albert Hall; the committee of experts who have not yet reached the end of their onerous duties as judges of the comparative merits of the various exhibits; the staff at the Albert Hall, and last, though by no means least, Mr. Hilton Carter and the executive who for a week placed their commodious building at Truth's disposal for a fee which was not much more than nominal when compared with what the full charge would have been had no special concession been made in the case of Truth.

There is another paragraph which it is also necessary to print, and always will be so long as we humans are fallible mortals and not perfectly-regulated machines. So certain is it that mistakes will occur, even at the best-constituted Toy and Doll Show, that the lines I am about to write might with safety be stereotyped and kept ready for use each successive year. My purpose, then, in writing this is briefly to apologise in anticipation for the mistakes which are to a certain extent inevitable, and to promise in advance that any errors that may be pointed out shall be corrected with all possible completeness and promptitude. It is, for example, certain that in some cases the prefix "Mrs." has been printed instead of "Miss," and vice versâ. A certain number of errors, also, must have been made in the spelling of surnames. The action of the law of averages makes the presence of such mistakes inevitable. In the hurry and bustle, too, of packing and unpacking and arranging the numerous articles which are exhibited, cards and labels are apt to get torn off or mislaid, or in some cases changed. But it ought not to be difficult to put any such little matters as these straight, and if any readers who notice any mistakes of this or any other kind, all that is asked of them is that they will at once communicate with Truth Office so that the errors may be corrected before the Prize list is finally made out. As usual, in addition to the prizes which proved such an attractive feature at the Show, it is the intention of the proprietor of Truth to present every lady who dressed a large Truth doll or not less than twelve small ones with a Truth brooch as a small memento of their association with the recent Show. These Truth brooches are of silver, and of an appropriate design, and next week it is intended to print a list of those exhibitors to whom one will be presented.

I meant to have alluded to faults of omission as well as of commission. It is tolerably certain that no mention was in some cases made of dolls and other exhibits which well deserved attention. That some things should have escaped notice is only what might be expected when it is understood under what unfavourable conditions as to time and space much of the work at the Albert Hall has to be done. But here again I trust it may be possible to put right the things that have temporarily gone wrong.

The following list, which is intended to be a complete one, will undoubtedly be found to some extent imperfect. It purports to contain the names of all the ladies who dressed either large or small Truth Dolls, but it has been found impossible to check it thoroughly. Will any dresser of dolls, therefore, whose name does not appear in the said list be good enough to send a card or letter pointing out the omission without delay? Here is the list as it stands at present:—

MUSIC.

A DEFENCE OF THE DEADHEAD.

THEY have been discussing our old friend the deadhead in France, and M. Jules Claretie has, it seems, come out with a bold suggestion. This is nothing less than a Deadhead Theatre—or Théâtre Libre, as it might perhaps be more gracefully described—which should be devoted entirely to that deserving section of the theatre- and concert-going public. Obviously it would need to be a large one, but sagacious M. Claretie has no doubts, it appears, as to the feasibility of the project. There would be no charge for admission, but the expenses would be defrayed by means of the advertisements which would decorate the auditorium. Obviously, too, these could be introduced with excellent effect in the course of the dialogue. The heroine would confide to her friend the name of the establishment at which she obtained her hats, while her lover would be equally communicative respecting the cigars he smoked, the boots he wore, and other details of like nature. Up to a point no doubt the play-bill supplies such information at present, but manifestly the practice could be greatly extended in the manner suggested. Possibly it might be questioned whether deadheads represent precisely the class to which your advertiser desires most to appeal. Yet a moment's thought reveals the injustice of that implied reflection upon the deadhead's social and economic status.

For, after all, which of us is not a deadhead when the occasion presents itself? Nay, have we not lately seen an entire audience of deadheads, embracing great, wise, and eminent of every order, one and all assembled at the bidding of a spirited contemporary to see justice done to an entertainment which a brutal paying public had contemned? Perish the thought, therefore, that should impute discredit to the deadhead or derogate from his position as an important and self-respecting member of the community. Is there not on record, indeed, the case of one such who took his functions so seriously, and had so lofty a conception of his duty to himself and the community, that when a certain production failed to win his approbation he solemnly rose in his stall, gathered up hat and coat, and, making his way to the box-office, sternly demanded the return of his visiting card? Even more impressive, perhaps, was the action of him who, similarly circumstanced, vacated his free fauteuil and positively paid for re-admission for the purpose of giving free vent to those expressions of disapproval which his native delicacy had compelled him, while a guest of the management, to withhold. In the light of such incidents, who shall venture to asperse the character and belittle the importance of a class to whom the character of our drama is so dear?

Musicians know the deadhead too. How, indeed, our concert-givers would subsist without his loyal support it is impossible to surmise. The truth is that in these days no self-respecting concert-goer with the smallest pretensions to musical or social distinction dreams of paying for his seat. The humble occupants of the gallery and other inferior places may do this if so minded, but stallites scorn recourse to such humiliating and plebeian practices. For them the policy of the open door and the free admission. Misguided attempts have been made at times by daring managers to oppose a custom so manifestly designed in the interests of the greatest happiness of the greatest number, but, needless to say, without result—nay, in certain cases with results all too tragical. What killed the "Pops," for example? The absence of the deadhead. Professor Kruse deemed him inessential, indulged the fond and foolish fancy that his presence could be dispensed with, and in this absurd belief went so far as actually to exclude him. Rash man! He little realised the force which he thus antagonised. But his awakening was swift. For the deadhead arose in his might and—the "Pops" were no more. How was it accomplished? In the most dignified manner possible. The deadhead simply stayed away in his thousands, and left the Professor and his colleagues to fiddle to empty benches.

Never again will Professor Kruse venture to give concerts without the co-operation of the deadhead. The thing cannot really be done in this country. On the contrary, the deadhead's market value is steadily rising, and in the height of the season it is only the privileged few who can command his attendance. The device has even been attempted before now of offering him tea as an additional inducement to attend afternoon performances, and this, perhaps, is only a beginning of what may follow. One obvious development suggests itself, for instance. London is a large place, and the cost of locomotion is considerable. Why should the deadhead be put to this expense? The question may well be asked. Let concert-givers see to it, therefore, and provide a vehicular service to convey him, even as the reluctant voter is carried to the poll, to the appointed place of meeting. And various other ways in which his lot might be ameliorated will readily suggest themselves. But whether this Claretie scheme will be reckoned by him worthy of encouragement is, perhaps, open to question. It must always be remembered that the deadhead is nothing if not critical, and this Free Theatre—well, what would be the quality of the performances? Would they be worthy of the deadhead's support? Would they be such that he could attend them without loss of dignity and artistic self-respect? Upon the answer to such questions would hang the issue of the venture.

The most interesting of last week's concerts was that of the London Symphony Orchestra, with Herr Steinbach as conductor. This was the second appearance which Herr Steinbach, who is now conductor at Cologne, has made in this country, and once more he proved himself an orchestral chief of the first order. Perhaps in some ways he recalls Herr Mottl more than any other of his contemporaries, particularly in respect of the sledge-hammer force which he knows how to obtain, and also in the vigour of his gestures, which at times are almost alarmingly energetic. Yet it is in the music of Brahms that he particularly excels, and his reading of that master's fourth symphony—in which he was heard, it will be remembered, on the occasion of his previous visit—was again a superb achievement. The prodigious vitality and vigour which he infused into the cryptic finale constituted, indeed, a brilliant refutation of the ancient belief, still entertained by not a few, that Brahms's music is lacking in emotional qualities. At the same time, while so forceful, he can also roar as gently as any sucking dove, and some of the pianissimi which he obtained were as wonderful in their way as his terrific climaxes. He is certainly the greatest of living Brahms conductors.

At the same time the suggestion is quite absurd that those who have previously liked their Brahms when interpreted in more humdrum fashion are made to look foolish by Steinbach's readings of his works. The argument seems to be that because Steinbach's readings differ to some extent from those of less gifted conductors, therefore all who have professed to have enjoyed the latter are either debarred from appreciating Steinbach's or convicted of insincerity. This, however, is ridiculous. It is, in fact, another variant of the old fallacy, recently referred to here, of exaggerating the conductor's powers and functions. Steinbach interprets Brahms supremely well, but he does not alter the character of his music; and it is the music in itself, as it stands in the score, and apart from this or that particular performance of it which Brahms-lovers enjoy.

The Concert-goers' Club reception at the Princes' Galleries on Sunday evening in honour of Dr. Richard Strauss was a very pleasant affair which brought together a large number of well-known musical folk, with Sir Edward Elgar as a worthy representative of our native art at the head of them. Many would doubtless have found the musical programme more attractive if it had included some of Strauss's own songs, but there was, it seems, a difficulty here. Strauss, it appears, cannot endure hearing his songs sung and played unless he has had a chance of coaching singer and accompanist, while he does not care to accompany a strange vocalist himself without previous rehearsal, and since his other engagements—for he has been as busy as ever during his brief stay in our midst—did not admit of this being arranged, those present had to be content instead with a capital performance by the composer and Professor Kruse of his early, but very brilliant and effective, sonata for violin and piano in E flat. On Monday evening Dr. Strauss conducted an orchestral concert given by Miss Ethel Newcomb, a clever young American pianist, who thus made her début under exceptionally interesting conditions.

The New York Musical Courier has an amusing story, by the way, of Strauss and a young Polish composer, Ludomir Rozycki by name, who recently called on him in Berlin with a letter of introduction. Strauss was, it seems, at the time in the kitchen investigating some derangement of the cooking stove (a task quite in the spirit of the "Sinfonia Domestica") and awaiting the advent of a sweep who had been summoned to give his professional attention to the matter. By some misunderstanding Rozycki made his way in by the back entrance, and, arriving at the psychological moment when the stove was behaving worse than ever, was accorded a warm reception by Strauss on the supposition that he was the belated sweep. Explanations ensued, of course, and eventually, we read, after perusal of the scores which his visitor had brought, Strauss telephoned to his publisher, Herr Bock, that he had found some new compositions that must be published, so it was a case of all's well that ends well.

Other recent concerts have not been very remarkable, apart from that directed by Herr Steinbach already referred to. There was, however, a very large audience, responsive as ever to an all-Wagner programme, at the Newman benefit concert given by the Queen's Hall orchestra. Two novelties of some interest were produced also at Mr. Arthur Newstead's recent concert—a prelude by Sir A. C. Mackenzie, entitled "Astarte" (written originally for a projected revival of "Manfred," by Sir Henry Irving), and a showy concert-overture by Mr. A. von Ahn Carse. At the Sunderland-Thistleton chamber concert on Friday a newly-discovered sonata by Purcell—by all accounts a delightful work—was an attractive feature of an exclusively British programme, while Mr. Frederic Lamond, at his Chopin recital on Saturday, proved himself once again a pianist of rare distinction. The National Sunday League concert on Sunday evening was interesting from the fact that the London Symphony Orchestra was conducted on this occasion by Mr. Landon Ronald. Mr. Ronald is one of the cleverest and most versatile of our younger musicians, and, in the opinion of many, has in him the makings of a really fine conductor. But the difficulty, of course, for such as he is to find the opportunity of practising and developing their powers. I understand, however, in Mr. Ronald's case that he is directing a series of concerts in Birmingham next year, which should help to this end.

The production of "Tristan und Isolde" in Paris last week for the first time at the National Opera points a moral for those who run away with the notion that only a fat subvention and a national opera-house are needed to solve the opera problem in this country. The Paris Opera enjoys a subsidy of £32,000 a year. "Tristan und Isolde" is generally regarded, perhaps, as the greatest of all Wagner's works; yet Parisians have never had a chance of hearing it given by their State-supported Opera until last week. In London, on the other hand, it has received numberless performances of the highest excellence. Could one find a more striking instance of that lack of initiative almost inevitably characteristic of your State-supported establishment? One of the correspondents, I notice, puts the thing down to Chauvinistic influences, but seeing that, as he also recalls, other Wagnerian works, such as "Lohengrin" and the "Meistersinger," have not been similarly tabooed, this explanation of the matter will hardly serve.

The delay in the production of "Tristan" is, in point of fact, all the more surprising since it is an opera which one might have thought would have appealed especially to French tastes, and doubtless most French music-lovers would, in fact, have been delighted long since to accord it welcome. State-supported officialdom stood in the way, however, and only now, forty years after the first performance of the work at Munich, have their wishes been gratified. In further disproof of the Chauvinistic theory, as the supposed explanation of what is perfectly explicable on other grounds, one may point to the fact that precisely similar treatment has been extended to the works of other countries. I should be surprised to learn, for example, that a single Russian opera has ever been produced at the Paris Opera, while the many notable works which living Italian composers have produced—"La Bohême," "Pagliacci," "Cavalleria," etc.—have been equally unsuccessful, it appears, in gaining admission through the sacred portals which M. Gailhard guards.

Mr. Frank Rendle's letter to a contemporary respecting the financial results of the recent San Carlo season at Covent Garden is interesting. According to his statement, after providing for his proportion of the expenses and paying his rent to the Grand Opera Syndicate, his profit was represented by the fact that he had the use of the theatre for balls on three occasions practically rent free. "On the other hand," he adds, "I had been paying rent for the theatre from August 25 to October 17 without deriving any return from my tenancy," which suggests at once the obvious advantages of a cheap opera season from the point of view of the lessee of the theatre, even if it does no more than pay the rent. It is wonderful, indeed, that it should be practicable to keep such a costly theatre as Covent Garden going at all by the agency of occasional fancy-dress balls alone. Meanwhile, the air is thick with rumours of future developments—a new opera-house to replace Covent Garden, a rival Italian season next summer to that of the Syndicate, a second new opera-house to be run in opposition to that which succeeds Covent Garden, and the establishment of light opera on the lines referred to in these notes last week at a theatre already in existence, being only a few of several projects concerning which gossip is busy.

LETTERS ON BOOKS.

MY DEAR MR. WYNDHAM,—It is Hobbes, I think, who says that "if there were any interest of appetite or passion inclining men to deny that the three angles of a triangle are together equal to two right angles, men would be found to deny it." I fancy that if Mr. Samuel Hussey could be induced to read Mr. Justin McCarthy's "The Story of an Irishman" (1) he would still persist in the assertion I quoted last week from his "Reminiscences" that Parnell was the "Veiled Prophet" of Fenianism, and "The Old Man of the Mountains" of Moonlightism. The whole story of "The Parnell Commission" and again of the "Committee Room Fifteen" revolt from Parnell, is told in Mr. McCarthy's autobiography with a judicial impartiality characteristic of that most modest and moderate of the Irish leaders. No less characteristic of Mr. McCarthy is his fast personal friendship with Parnell after he had himself become the leader of the anti-Parnellites:—

> Meanwhile, my personal relations with Parnell continued to be on a friendly footing, and he always received me with old-time cordiality. On one occasion we went together to a banking-house in the City to make new arrangements about the appropriation of some funds which had been deposited there in his name in the days when he was leader of the united party. I only mention this incident because of the astonishment created in Palace Yard when Parnell and I drove up in the same hansom to the members' entrance of the House of Commons. It was the talk of the lobby for hours after, that we two, who were now regarded as deadly enemies, should have come to the House together in this way, as if we had never been separated by disunion of any kind. I had heard from many friends that Parnell was doing serious injury to his health by rushing from place to place in Ireland during a dreary winter, and, furthermore, taxing his strength by the incessant making of speeches to great open-air meetings. I remonstrated with him and urged him not to over-tax his strength. He listened quietly to all my remonstrances and thanked me for them, but assured me that the incessant movement was at the present crisis likely to do him more good than harm, as it kept him from brooding too much over the troubles that had come upon the country and upon him.

When I made the same remonstrance to Parnell in those days, and warned him that he would kill himself by rushing back and forward from Brighton to the remotest corners of Ireland, he said, with a genial smile, "Nothing but the bad whiskey I get down there will ever kill me." But a fortnight later he was dead. Perhaps I ought to guard against any matter-of-fact misconstruction of this playful speech of Parnell's by saying what, indeed, Mr. McCarthy also says, that the Irish leader was temperate almost to teetotalism. I remember another speech of Parnell's to me at this time because of its unconscious humour. A prominent English politician and journalist, having asked him to put him in for an Irish seat for a purpose Parnell held to be unworthy, "I told him," said Parnell to me, "to go to the devil, and he then went to Tim Healy." Talking of jokes, this was not a bad interpolation to an anti-Parnellite speech which Mr. McCarthy records. "I deeply regret," said the anti-Parnellite orator at Cork,

"having to oppose Parnell, whom I have known since he was in petticoats." "Ah," cried the wit, "if he had only left 'em alone after that!" I cannot resist giving one other extract from this calm and kindly retrospect of an honourable and admirable life, describing Mr. McCarthy's farewell interview with Gladstone:—

On March 5, 1894, I had my last interview with Mr. Gladstone, who welcomed me with the kindness and cordiality which I had ever experienced from him since I came to be personally known to him. We had a long talk on political subjects and on many other subjects as well. He assured me, with all the earnestness and the emphasis so characteristic of him when he felt deeply on any question, that he was thoroughly devoted to the cause of Home Rule for Ireland, and perfectly satisfied in his mind that the Home Rule cause was destined to come, and before very long, to a triumphant issue. He spoke of Parnell in language of generous appreciation, and expressed his profound regret that so really great a career should have come to so sudden and disastrous an end.

"My husband is so good-natured," says Mrs. Cadwallader in "Middlemarch," "that he even speaks well of his bishop, which no other beneficed clergyman was ever known to do"; and Mr. McCarthy is so full of the milk of human kindness that he even speaks well of his publishers!

Another book of very considerable interest, both from the political and personal point of view, is the biography of the Duke of Devonshire (2) which Mr. Leach has written. As the author justly remarks, the career of the Duke has been much less discussed in contemporary literature than those of persons of much less importance and interest, and his effort to fill the blank is both judicious and complete, and well repays perusal. You were telling me quite recently of some beautifully-illustrated books, but I am quite certain that though you may have found some to equal, it would be impossible to find anything to excel "The Silken East" (3). These two gorgeous volumes, diversely illustrated with photographs and colour plates, tell the history of Burma, describe its scenery, its architecture, its peoples and their lives, habits, and customs, with a completeness which has hitherto rarely, if ever, been equalled by any enthusiastic resident in any of our dependencies. Less distinguished for its illustrations is another volume dealing with the Far East which I have been perusing with much pleasure. There is not much that is absolutely new in Lady Susan Townley's "Chinese Note Book" (4), but to any one who likes to get a first-hand impression of sights and scenes they have no opportunity of viewing for themselves, this note-book is to be thoroughly recommended. It is just a bright and chatty record of a clever and observant woman's experience amongst the Celestials. But to return to the volumes in which the illustrations are the principal feature. Coming nearer home, "The Channel Islands" (5) find a capable historian in Miss Edith F. Carey, and a chronicler of their beauty spots in Mr. H. B. Winbush; and "Bonnie Scotland" (6) has full regard paid to her wealth of beauty by Mr. Sutton Palmer, with whom as author Mr. A. B. Hope Moncrieff is worthily associated. And, again, "Familiar London" (7), painted by Miss Rose Barton, has all the elements of popularity. It is a sentimental London, a picture of the West End, which Miss Barton produces, but of the great East and still greater South one learns nothing. The painter of an unfamiliar London would, I fancy, do a real public service, but he has not at present made his appearance. The publishers of these last three books do not, however, confine themselves to the production of highly-priced volumes, and to mention only one amongst the many cheaper illustrated books which betray evidences of earnest care in the production, Mr. Lewis Hind's "Adventures Among Pictures" (8) must needs appeal irresistibly to any one with a scrap of love for art. Nor are Messrs. Black the only publishers who bring knowledge and care to the making of beautiful books. Messrs. Dent and Co. have an honourable record in this direction, and fully is their reputation sustained in the story of "Paris" (9), told by Mr. Thomas Okey and illustrated by Miss Katherine Kimball and Mr. O. F. M. Ward. Mr. Okey brings knowledge as well as enthusiasm to his work, and the result is a volume which, adorned with fine colour plates, dainty pen-and-ink drawings, and many half-tone reproductions of pictures, is one of the most complete of its kind. A companion volume to the "Paris" is the "Rome" (10), in which the great task of presenting within the compass of a single volume a satisfactory history of the Eternal City from classical times until the Sack of Rome, is successfully—even brilliantly—performed.

Now as regards fiction, Mrs. Thurston's intensely interesting "John Chilcote, M.P." (11) reminds me of a madman's reasoning—irrefragable, if you accept the premises. But the premises are difficult to accept, and this very difficulty is the best measure of the success of the author who has overcome it so completely. Two men are so indistinguishably alike that they can play Jekyll and Hyde to each other. The one an M.P. with the most promising prospects and the most charming, beautiful, and accomplished wife, so despairs of himself as the hopeless and helpless victim of the drug habit, that he induces the other to take his place in the world, the House, and the home. Unfortunately, however, the Hyde of the story is always turning up, or telegraphing to the imminent risk of the exposure of Jekyll's impersonation of him. The tangle is complicated by the mutual passion which grows up between Jekyll and the wife of the derelict Hyde. How the story ends I shall leave you to find out for yourself, merely assuring you that your interest, which is perhaps more psychological even than dramatic, never falters and never ceases to grow to the end. When "Vanity Fair" was appearing in numbers, Mrs. Liddell, the wife of the Dean, said to Thackeray, "Oh, Mr. Thackeray, you must let Dobbin marry Amelia." "So he shall," replied Thackeray, "and when he does he shall find her not worth the having." That is precisely your feeling about all that the hero of Mr. Mason's "The Truants" (12) undergoes to win the love and respect of his silly little wife. Pamela, the other principal lady, also disappoints you a little by her resolute refusal to give the hero her reasons for advising him on no account to leave his wife. However, your interest in the hero and his adventures make well up to you for your lack of interest in the lady for whom they were undergone. "The Heart of Penelope" (13) is capacious and capricious, and, indeed, is best described by the second or, perhaps, third hero of the novel, Lord Wantley: "Penelope is never content, never even approximately happy, unless she is—well, unless she has some man, or, better still, several men in play. With her it has always been a game, and a game only becomes absorbing and exciting when there is present an element of danger." Truth to say, I do not care for Penelope and her prurient confidences to each of her lovers that her first marriage to the millionaire was merely nominal. Cecily, the second heroine, is, however, a charming girl, and the novel is true to life and admirably written. I do not know when I read a set of short stories—chiefly American—of such uniform interest and excellence as Mr. Robert Barr's "The Lady Elect" (14). Perhaps the most interesting is "The Great Mogul," the most amusing "Two of a Trade," and the most improbable "Long Distance Telephone."—Believe me, my dear Mr. Wyndham, ever yours very sincerely,

P.S.—Messrs. Hutchinson, you will be glad to hear, have just commenced the issue of a new series of standard fiction, of which the first volumes are "Tom Jones," "Roderick Random," "Joseph Andrews," and "Peregrine Pickle." In well printed, daintily bound volumes, at 1s. 6d. in cloth and half-a-crown bound in leather, they could not be improved upon.

P.P.S.—Try "Bed-Time Fairy Tales" (Simpkin, Marshall, and Co., 3s. 6d.) on the youngsters. They are just the type of stories which never fail in their appeal to the sprouting intelligence; bright, clear, and with a sufficient admixture of the wonder element in their composition.

GIRLS' GOSSIP.

DEAREST AMY,—As you know, we have dearly loved the Dutch ever since our visit to The Hague and Scheveningen one glorious August. So it is joyful to us to see that, for some reason, Holland and its people are in very great favour this Christmas, on cards and on crackers. The quaint garb and curious headgear make the pictures what they should always be, picturesque. Anything sweeter than a small, white-capped Dutch child, laughing at a rabbit washing its absurd face you cannot imagine, unless it be the pretty girl to whose skirt she is clinging, and who is laughing with her. This card was sent us by the charming friend with the lovely voice and glorious hair, whose high notes are sweet and clear as a thrush's, and whose tremolo is a delicate thrill on a note instead of the unsteady wobbling that the majority of singers make of it. And, more proof of the popularity of the Dutch, one of the most successful of the doll groups at the great TRUTH Toy Show at the Albert Hall was one sent by the Misses Glave, representing a seashore in Holland—probably our beloved Scheveningen itself—with brown-sailed fishing boats riding on the (paper) waves, and a crowd of Dutch fisher-folk on the sands. They are buying and selling, marrying and giving in marriage, and the skill and ingenuity testified in this composition are beyond praise.

Miss Streatfeild's lovely dolls, all so beautifully dressed, were engaged in every kind of amusement. Above them were the baby and the nurses, one of the latter French, one German, and one Italian, all dressed in their national costume. From far Tokio came a number of nurses, dressed in costume by Mrs. C. Barclay, and all making bandages for the wounded in this ghastly war.

A very pretty and beautifully-dressed set of dolls was contributed by Mme. Clematis, of South Molton-street. Naturally, the hats were quite exquisite and up to date. So many of the large dolls were beautifully dressed that I cannot pick out even one for special praise, but I must just mention the lovely groups representing the first act of "Véronique," the successful comic opera.

The eleven thousand sixpences, again anonymously contributed this year, were always surrounded. In these hard times the very sight of a little ready money attracts spectators, even if they know perfectly well that they cannot have it!

A funny thing happened the other day. The aunts were staying with us in town for their Christmas shopping, and after luncheon the elder, who is a perfect prima donna in snoring, fell asleep and began a most extraordinary performance, partly whistling, partly grunting, and partly choking. Our nice Puff, fearfully distressed, by this, and evidently thinking poor Aunt Tabitha in danger of strangling, behaved just as the dear idiot of a dog would behave and seated himself in front of her chair, sobbing with misery and concern. Bee was giggling, of course, and the climax came when, upon our esteemed relative finishing an elaborate passage with a gurgling cadenza poor Puff, screaming with anguish and bent on saving her from disaster, jumped on her knee and nearly killed her with fright. It was really difficult to answer Aunt Tabitha's many questions with becoming seriousness.

She and Aunt Jemima are going to live for ever. They have taken a house at Cheltenham, where old ladies and gentlemen live on and on. I suppose it is the odour of intense respectability pervading the place that keeps them alive. It acts as a preservative, perhaps, or as a prophylactic. And another thing that almost guarantees our aunts a good spell of longevity is the fact that they have sunk in annuities every penny they possess. Is it the resultant peace of mind and freedom from worry that keep annuitants alive? Or is is that persons who are capable of such selfishness (Richard calls it selfish) as depriving their proper heirs of legacies in order to make sure of comfort in their own old age, must be of a pachydermatous construction not to be easily assailed by illness or worry?

Richard condemns them, but I do not. I think it is only considerate of the old aunts to provide for their own old age. Think of the thousands and thousands who do not buy themselves annuities and who fall into poverty through ill-judged speculation, or through overgenerosity. What a burden they are to themselves and their friends. One pities them sincerely, but one also commiserates their relatives.

We saw some very fascinating old glass the other day at Mortlock's. The long stems and trumpet-bowls of these early designs are most graceful. Some of them—in fact, the majority—have curious spiral designs in opaque or semi-opaque white, within the stems. These patterns are occasionally most complicated, like a very Laocoon of corkscrews; and with every movement of the glass they seem to stir in a most weird manner. We were told that this effect was obtained by bubbles, but our minds were as much exercised as to how they came thus as George IV was puzzled about the apple in the dumpling. We saw a half-yard glass for ale, and many dumpy Flemish and Belgian glasses. An English one has the Stuart rose beautifully engraved on it. There is a refinement about engraved glass which enhances its beauty, and the old pieces are most excellent works of art. We did not care for the gilded Spanish glass, nor for those with intimate sacred scenes engraved upon them, though all were interesting. Would it not be delightful if one could have a separate consciousness to keep at work all the time learning about such things as pictures and glass, carvings, prints, engravings, silver, china, and all the other executive technical arts that are as difficult to appreciate as they are worth understanding.

Is it not a good idea to have "Forget-me-Not" on one's umbrella-stand? We saw one of these in repoussé copper at Hewetson's, in Tottenham Court-road, when we went to choose a nice, comfortable armchair for the dear pater. Their furniture always lasts so well and never develops moth, and their chairs and couches are of the most luxurious character—veritable sleepy hollows. One sinks into them with almost aggressive contentment, so downy the stuffing, and so excellent the springs. I also found an "occasional" chair there that is just the right height and shape for sewing in, or doing some bit of fancy work. It has a shape that really supports the human back without permitting it to lounge, and though it has arms, they are not high enough to interfere with the energetic movement of the hands when busily employed. I also found an easy chair for good old Sarah, which will add a joy to her comfortable declining years. The luxury of supplying her with it and seeing her comfortable in it is very cheap at four pounds, I think.

We are off to-morrow to spend Christmas in our riverside cottage. It is so nice to leave the poor maids all the trouble of sweeps and cleaning house, and to come back and find it all done. "You won't forget to leave us plenty of Scrubb, m'm, please," said Ada to me this morning. By this she means our friend in need, Scrubbs' Cloudy Ammonia, a treasure to the cleanly housewife, and a boon in the bathroom. A little in the bath imparts a most delightful sensation of refreshment. It makes an excellent hairwash, too, producing a lustrous gloss. As to hair-brushes it cleanses them in a few seconds. Mim cleans all her trinkets with it, and in the laundry it is, if possible, more valuable even than elsewhere.

We bade farewell to our adored London at a little dinner in the beautiful East Room at the Criterion. Our table was in the window, and we could look out on the wonderful triangle in which the lights of London appear to be concentrated, and where the pulse of the great city beats fastest. There was liquid mud outside, but it added to the picture by reflecting all the lights—the white, the red, the blue. Over our heads was a blue sky with white clouds, "like lambs in a meadow." It was but painted on the ceiling, yet we enjoyed its festive aspect and its contrast to the murky sky outside. Jim always says that the Criterion chef pleases his (Jim's) palate better than any other in London. Three things in the menu he selected for very special praise, the suprême de turbotin Rachel, the wild duck à la presse, and the celery with marrow. And then the music is so nice and soft that one can enjoy it as an accompaniment to conversation without having to tire oneself by shouting to make oneself heard.

This is a lovely Christmas cake:—

Beat 1 lb. of butter with 1 lb. of sugar until it is very light, then beat in nine eggs separately, adding a glass of old brandy and half a glass of rum, a little at a time. Then mix in 1 lb. of flour, 4 oz. of almonds blanched, chopped, and baked a fawn colour, ½ lb. of raisins stoned and chopped, ½ lb. of currants, ½ lb. of sultanas, ½ lb. of chopped mixed peel, the grated rind of two fresh lemons, and a grated nutmeg. Mix thoroughly together and bake it in a large tin or stewpan that is lined with thick paper, well greased, and bake it in a moderate oven for four hours. Mix 1 lb. of ground almonds with 2 lb. of icing and castor sugar mixed, the juice of a large lemon, and the yolks of four eggs. Mix it into a stiff paste and put it evenly on the top of the cake. Then put two coatings of icing on the cake, allowing one to dry before putting on the second, which latter should be a little thinner. After it is dry, pipe it with white icing and decorate it wth silver argentines and leaves. Put a frill round the bottom.

To Make White Icing.—Put 1 lb. of sifted icing sugar into a basin, make a well in the centre, in which put the whites of two fresh eggs and the juice of a lemon, then work it gradually at first, increasing the speed, until it is quite stiff and perfectly white.

Ever your loving cousin, MADGE.

P.S.—Lady Bancroft shed a few tears—how could she help it?—when opening the Scala Theatre on Monday afternoon on the site of the dear old Prince of Wales's. It is a beautiful playhouse.

Apropos of theatres, you will be glad to hear that the matinée capotes are going strong. Their home is at 41, Conduit-street, and there is to be a sale on there beginning on the 2nd, with gowns, furs, etc. Verbum sap.!

ENTRE NOUS

Anon., 5s.; George S. Snelgrove, £5; T. P., £2; Anon., £1 1s.; Lieut.-General Sir Henry Moore, £2 2s.; Walter E. Johnston, £1 1s.; In memory of A .D. B., Cadet R.N., £4; Cornubia, 5s.; H. M. Bourne, £1; Twins, £1 1s.; Mrs. Godfrey, 10s.

I regret to have to add that these contributions are not sufficient to wipe out the deficit with which the fund is confronted. The account, however, will be kept open for another week, in the hope that further subscriptions will still be forthcoming, and that the two sides of the account may be satisfactorily balanced. The usual financial statement will be published as soon as practicable.

The King and Queen will spend the latter part of January at Windsor Castle, and on Sunday, the 22nd, there is to be a memorial service in the Frogmore Mausoleum, at which the Archbishop of Canterbury and the Dean of Windsor will officiate. The Prince and Princess of Wales, who will then be in residence at Frogmore House, and most of the other members of the Royal Family who are in England will be present at this service.

The Royal yacht Victoria and Albert is to be docked at Portsmouth in order that she may undergo an overhaul and refit. The King will proceed to the Mediterranean in the Victoria and Albert early in March, and it is expected that his Majesty will be away from England between six and seven weeks. If the King decides not to embark at Portsmouth he will travel overland to Lisbon, where his Majesty will join the Victoria and Albert, and he is to visit Gibraltar, Malta, Palermo, Naples, Athens, Corfu, and Venice, where the cruise will probably terminate. The King will then return home overland. His Majesty will probably leave England about Saturday, March 11.

The Queen will leave England about the middle of March on a visit to King Christian at Copenhagen, where the Empress Marie of Russia is then also expected for a stay of several weeks. Princess Charles of Denmark, who is residing at Appleton House, near Sandringham, will accompany her mother to Copenhagen, where Prince Charles is expected to return about the same time from the Mediterranean, where he is now cruising on board the Danish corvette Heimdal, of which his uncle, Prince Waldemar, is the commander.

The King has made an important change in the regulations for Investitures. Hitherto the order has been: "No Insignia are worn by gentlemen who are to be invested." In future, however, the recipients of honours are to wear any Orders, decorations, or medals which they may have received. Investitures are now State ceremonials. Queen Victoria observed semi-State if the function was at Windsor Castle, but at Osborne there was a considerable reduction in the ceremonial, with fewer members of the Court in attendance. It is understood that next year the periodical Investitures of the Bath, the St. Michael and St. George, the Indian Orders, and the military decorations will be held by the King in the Throne Room at St. James's Palace. Queen Victoria usually conferred Investitures to the higher classes of the several Orders—i.e., Knights Grand Crosses and Knights Commanders. The King, however, has kindly consented to invest the Companions of the Orders, who are introduced into his Majesty's presence in single file, as at a Levee.

I understand that much annoyance has been caused at Court by the statement of a weekly journal that the late Lord Hardwicke received a letter from Queen Victoria in which she thanked him for his opposition to the proposal that a statue of Cromwell should be erected at Westminster, which her late Majesty regarded as "a gratuitous insult to her person, her Crown, and her people." If such a letter is really in existence, the publication of any part of the contents is a gross and flagrant breach not only of etiquette, but of ordinary propriety. Everybody knows, or ought to know, that all Royal letters are supposed to be treated as strictly private and confidential communications, the contents of which are not to be divulged, much less published, without a special permission. The executors of a deceased person who has received letters from a Sovereign are expected to return any such letters either to the writer or to the reigning Monarch.

Some of the morning papers published a telegram from Lisbon last week, containing crazy announcements about the approaching marriage of the Crown Prince of Portugal to "a granddaughter of King Edward." The only granddaughters of his Majesty are the daughters of the Duke and Duchess of Fife, the eldest of whom is in her fourteenth year; and Princess Victoria of Wales, who is not yet eight. The Crown Prince of Portugal can only marry a Roman Catholic, and his bride will certainly be expected to bring a large dot with her to Lisbon. It is much more likely that the King and Queen of Portugal will try to find a wife in Austria for their eldest son. One of the daughters of the Archduke Frederick and the Archduchess Isabella would be in all respects an excellent match for him.

It is probable that Prince Arthur of Connaught will go to Darmstadt to represent the Court at the marriage of his cousin, the Grand Duke of Hesse, and Princess Eleonore of Solms-Lich, which is to take place there in the Lutheran Church on Thursday, February 2. The Landgrave of Hesse-Cassel, who is first cousin both of the Queen and of the Duchess of Connaught, is at present next heir to the Grand Duchy of Hesse, the ultimate heir being his younger brother, Prince Frederick Charles, who is married to Princess Margaret of Prussia, youngest sister of the Emperor William.

The two elder sons of the Prince of Wales are going to Osborne in the spring. Prince Edward will enter the Army later on, but it is considered desirable that he should previously receive some naval training. Prince Albert is to enter the Navy, and after the usual preliminary education he will become a midshipman, and in the first instance he will probably be appointed to the Royal yacht.

The Dowager Duchess of Saxe-Coburg-Gotha, who died on Wednesday at Callenberg, her dower house in the Thuringian Forest, was the eldest daughter of Leopold Grand Duke of Baden, and widow of Duke Ernest of Saxe-Coburg-Gotha, elder brother of Prince Albert. The Duchess Alexandrine was a very clever and sensible woman, highly accomplished, and keenly interested in literature and art. She was always on terms of warm friendship with her sister-in-law, Queen Victoria, and they maintained a regular and very confidential correspondence for nearly forty years.

King Oscar has recently conferred the Swedish Order of the Seraphim upon Lord Breadalbane, who is the first British subject that has ever received that famous decoration. The Seraphim is one of the oldest Orders in Europe, having been founded in 1334 by Magnus IV. The insignia consists of an eight-pointed star of white enamel and gold, with a Jerusalem cross at the end of each ray, and the head of a winged seraph between every two rays. The ribbon is blue, and etiquette prescribes that it must be worn from right to left.

The Empress Eugénie, who has been residing for several months at Farnborough Hill, will leave England early in January for the Riviera. The Empress will make a short stay in Paris before going to the Villa Cyrnos, where she intends to reside until the beginning of May. The Prince de Lucinge and the Comte de Montfort have been on a visit at Farnborough Hill, and Princess Henry of Battenberg and her daughter, Princess Ena, are to spend a few days there early next month.

The Duke of Richmond and Gordon, who spent the autumn at Gordon Castle, Banffshire, has been visiting their Majesties at Sandringham, Sir John and Lady Evelyn Cotterell at Garnons, Herefordshire, and Mr. and Lady Violet Brassey at Apethorpe Hall, Northamptonshire, since he came up from Scotland. The Duke is now residing at Molecomb, the family dower-house in Goodwood Park. Extensive improvements are being carried out at Goodwood House, which is to be lighted by electricity, and the Duke will return there when the work is completed.

Lord and Lady Ancaster, who have been residing at Grimsthorpe Castle since the middle of October, have removed to Normanton Park, their place in Rutlandshire, intending to stay there until after Easter. There will be a party next month at Normanton for the county ball at Stamford. Normanton Park, which is the old seat of the Heathcotes, of whom Lord Ancaster is the representative, is large and well wooded, and stretches along a range of high ground, from which there are fine views. The house is modern, and of no great interest. At Grimsthorpe there is one of the finest galleries of pictures in England, and superb collections of old furniture, china, and antique gold and silver plate.

Sir Augustus Wollaston Franks, who died about seven years ago, bequeathed his rare and splendid collection of book-plates, which is generally considered to be the finest and most comprehensive ever formed, to the British Museum. The collection, which consists of about seventy thousand examples (forty thousand British and thirty thousand foreign), has been arranged and catalogued by Mr. Gambier Howe, the well-known expert on this subject, and is displayed in the Print Room. The Franks collection commences with the plate of Sir Thomas Tresame, dated 1585. Sir Augustus Franks never was able to obtain an impression of the famous plate which was engraved in 1574 for the books presented to Cambridge University by Sir Nicholas Bacon.

Mrs. Meynell-Ingram, who died last week after a long illness, was a sister of Lord Halifax, and she was married in 1863 to Mr. Hugo Meynell-Ingram, M.P. for West Staffordshire, who died in 1871, leaving her the whole of his estates, the net rental of which is nearly £100,000 a year. She was Lady of the Manor of Leeds. Mr. Meynell-Ingram was the heir of Lord Irvine, one of whose daughters was Elizabeth Marchioness of Hertford, who exercised great political and social influence during the first twenty years of the last century. Lady Hertford died in 1835, and the Irvine estates (which were then worth over £40,000 a year) passed to her nephew, Mr. Hugo Meynell, who assumed the name of Ingram, and was the father-in-law of the late Mrs. Meynell-Ingram. Temple Newsam, the family seat near Leeds, is a magnificent Jacobean house, which is famous in Yorkshire for the large and valuable collection of pictures which it contains, and it is surrounded by an extensive and well-wooded deer park. The place was sold during the reign of James I. by the Duke of Lennox to Sir Arthur Ingram, who built the present house early in the reign of Charles I. Mrs. Meynell-Ingram was very liberal to her tenants, exceedingly hospitable and most charitable. She was a staunch Churchwoman, and untiring and munificent in good works.

Lord Tollemache owned large estates in Cheshire and Suffolk, and he was well known as a generous and considerate landlord. Indeed, the Tollemache estates have always been managed with equal good judgment and liberality. Lord Tollemache sat in Parliament as Tory member for West Cheshire for thirteen years, retiring in 1885. He had replaced his father who represented the constituency from 1841 until 1872. The Suffolk and Cheshire estates came to this family by the marriage of Lady Jane Tollemache, sister and co-heir of Wilbraham Earl of Dysart, to Mr. John Halliday, and their grandson, the late Lord Tollemache, assumed the name of Tollemache in 1837. The first Lord Tollemache also inherited the estates of his maternal grandfather, the Earl of Aldborough. Helmingham Hall, the family seat in Suffolk, is a stately brick house, built during the reign of Henry VIII., and surrounded by a moat, which is crossed by a drawbridge. The hall is full of superb old furniture and panelling of black oak. The library was once famous for its rare and splendid collection of early printed books, but many of these have been sold. The park, which is one of the finest in East Anglia, is richly wooded, and the oaks are remarkable for age and size

A very prominent Edinburgh citizen has passed away in the person of Mr. Donald Macgregor, of Ardgartan. He was for nearly fifty years the proprietor of the well-known Royal Hotel in Princes-street, which was originally a very small hostelry, but it was extended until it became the largest establishment in Edinburgh. Mr. Macgregor, who was all his life a most zealous Liberal, obtained great fame early in the sixties by successfully resisting the alleged right of the War Office to billet soldiers in Edinburgh, as he triumphantly proved his contention that the city has the privilege of exemption from that tax. For his public services in defeating the War Office he was presented with some handsome testimonials. About twenty years ago Mr. Macgregor, who was in many respects a typical Highlander, purchased the beautiful estate of Ardgartan, which is in the heart of the old Macgregor country, and at the same time he acquired two of the islands on Loch Lomond.

During the past year there have been thirty-four sales of Shorthorns, and 1,767 beasts have been thus disposed of, the average price being £45 17s. 6d. This is a very satisfactory result, as last year the average for 1,960 lots was only £36 3s. 4d., and in 1902 and in 1901 there were much lower averages. The great event of the year was the sale of the late Mr. Marr's famous herd at Upper Mill, Aberdeenshire, when the average for the 113 lots was £156, the highest price being 1,200 gs., which was paid for the celebrated young bull Bapton Favourite, who was sold to go to South America, along with twenty-three more of the best lots.

A copy of the famous "Psalmorum Codex" of Füst and Schöffer, of 1459, printed upon vellum on 136 folio leaves in large Gothic characters, was sold at Sotheby's the other day for £4,000 to Messrs. Bar, of Frankfort, Mr. Quaritch being the under-bidder. This copy came from the library of Schloss Freuenthum, in Carinthia, where it had been preserved since 1781. Only twelve copies of this Psalter were printed, all at the expense of the Carthusian Monastery of St. James in Mentz. Four copies have been sold in England. The first (Ralph Willett's) realised £63 at the dispersal of the Merlby library in 1813. The second belonged to that celebrated collector, Sir Mark Masterman Sykes, and at his sale in 1824 it was purchased for £136 10s. by Sir John Thorold. This copy came up again at the dispersal of the Syston Park library in 1884, when it fetched £4,950. The fourth copy was George Hibbert's and it realised £90 6s. in 1829. This was Count Macarthy's copy, which had been purchased at Paris in 1815 for £134.

Sir William Beechey's fine portrait of George IV., when Prince of Wales, which realised 1,600 gs. at the sale of the Duke of Cambridge's collection, has passed into the possession of the King, and it will be hung in one of the State apartments at Buckingham Palace, where there is a splendid gallery of portraits by Gainsborough, Reynolds, and Hoppner. This portrait, which is considered to be Beechey's best work, represents the Prince in the uniform of the 10th Hussars, with the Star of the Garter, and in powdered hair. This picture was given by George IV. during his last illness to his sister, Princess Mary, Duchess of Gloucester, who left it to the Duke of Cambridge.

Mr. George W. E. Russell is writing a monograph on Sydney Smith for the English Men of Letters Series. The chief authorities as to Sydney Smith's career are Lady Holland's biography and his own letters, which were edited for publication by Mr. Austen. Nothing better has been written about Sydney Smith than Hayward's excellent article, which was published in the Edinburgh Review in July, 1855. A great deal, however, yet remains to be written. Mr. Russell is a grandson of the sixth Duke of Bedford, who was beset with petitions in 1816 that he would give the vacant and then valuable living of St. Paul's, Covent Garden, to Sydney Smith, who was at that time settled in Yorkshire as Rector of Foston, and could have held both benefices together.

A fourth volume of Sir Horace Rumbold's very entertaining reminiscences is to be published by Mr. Edward Arnold early next year, entitled "Final Recollections of a Diplomatist," and it will deal with his residences at Athens, The Hague, and Vienna.

I see that Mr. G. R. Hatton, latest address Ormonde, Hythe, Kent, is still seeking, by post-card, particulars of your life for "Men of the Day," from anybody who is disposed to supply the same. I hear of him last through a Yorkshire doctor, who has received one of these attentions, and who rightly surmises that Hatton's object is to obtain a subscription. As a general rule, people absolutely unknown beyond their family circle, who are ready to pay money for the printing of their biographies, are not deserving of much sympathy; but as there may be individuals here and there who, from ignorance of the publication in question, look upon Hatton's invitation as a compliment, it may be as well to mention again that to have your biography published in "Men of the Day" is equivalent to being written down an ass. This, I imagine, nobody knows better than Mr. G. R. Hatton.

A lady journalist lately wrote to me thus from Johannesburg:—

> During a spell of illness, when my only recreation was reading, and kind friends brought me all the current magazines to while away the time, I was most impressed by the number of the aristocracy who have entered the field of literature, and at the space which their contributions occupy in some of the leading reviews and magazines.
> The unfairness of their competition must be palpable to any one. The glamour of their titles appeals to editors and readers alike. The former evidently know the commercial value of such adornments, or they would not publish large quantities of stuff, which, if it came unlabelled, would be promptly consigned to the W.P.B.
> If a woman has a message to the world, whether educational, political, or philanthropic, then, whether she be a woman of means or not, she is only doing her duty in uttering it. But it is the numbers that write for vanity's sake that deserve condemnation. Very few of them have any spark of literary talent. Most of their short stories are feeble réchauffés of old tales, which would never see the light on their own merits. But these society ladies are anxious to pose as clever women and literary geniuses, and their titles gain them their desire, to the detriment of the woman who can write. If they want literary notoriety, let them publish in book form, and pay the cost themselves, leaving the book-stall public to crown them with glory, or the reverse. It is not right that a title should gain them entrance into an important review or expensive magazine, side by side with the noted writers of the world; and it is not fair that they should occupy valuable space that would otherwise be given to those whose living depends on the acceptance of their work.

There was a discussion going on in one of the papers lately, as to whether women of means should work for pay. I gather that the writer of the above letter has no objection to titled ladies scribbling, or to their being paid for it. Her grievance is simply that the title confers an undue value upon their scribblings in the eyes of editors and readers. As far as editors are concerned, I should think this is true. As for the readers, I can only say that whenever I myself see an article in one of the leading monthlies with a titled name appended to it, I always pass it over, and I should think most other readers do the same. I have always supposed that certain editors encourage aristocratic contributors for their own personal ends. Certainly, if I myself published an article by a peer, I should think that the least he ought to do was to ask me to dinner and introduce me to his friends. I do not see any other way in which I could be recompensed for the sacrifice.

Of course, the grievance of my correspondent is a perfectly genuine one. What, however, she seems to me to have overlooked is that it is merely a particular instance of a much larger grievance. It is one of the chief objections to titles, at any rate hereditary titles, that they confer on the wearer a position in all walks of life, quite independent of merit. Look at the number of peers and baronets who earn handsome salaries as company directors, to the exclusion of experienced business men. Look at the places they fill in Cabinets and Government Offices, to the exclusion of commoners very much more competent. Even going back to journalism, look at the space given to the portraits of titled ladies in the illustrated papers. The prettiest and best-dressed woman in London has no chance against them, unless she happens to be an actress. Are all these exalted personages to be dragged down from their pedestals to make way for mere merit? It is a pity that this lady journalist did not think to what lengths her argument tends before she asked me to publish it.

There is one point in the letter with which I regret I cannot agree. If, says my correspondent, a woman has a message to the world, "she is only doing her duty in uttering it." I know this is a common idea, but I cannot precisely see how the alleged duty arises. There is no lack of such messages, and the world does not seem much the better for them. Should this meet the eye of any woman who feels that she has a message to the world, I would earnestly entreat her not to cast her pearls before swine.

The Provost and Fellows of Oriel College have presented the Rev. Roger Hayes Robinson, domestic chaplain to the Bishop of Bath and Wells, to the Vicarage of Twerton, Bath, vacant by the resignation of Prebendary Shaw after an incumbency of twenty-eight years. The parish is a large one, and the work is very hard. There is an excellent house, but the outgoings are heavy, and the net stipend is practically nil. Mr. Hayes Robinson is not an Oriel man, and it is understood that as nobody connected with the college would accept the living the Provost requested the Bishop of the diocese to make the appointment. The new Vicar, who is wide-minded in his Church views, is quite a young man, but he is an excellent preacher. He has already got through a lot of good work, and his zeal and energy will find ample scope in this parish, the population consisting principally of the working classes.

The advowson of Twerton was purchased by Oriel early in the twenties of the last century for £6,000. It was desired by the High Churchmen in the College to obtain a footing for their party in Bath, which was then a stronghold of the most austere section of the Evangelicals. Twerton was a small suburb of Bath, pleasantly situated on the Avon, with an adequate income and a good church. The advowson was sold for an exceptionally large sum, because the incumbent had been for some time in failing health, and was supposed to be dying. No sooner had Oriel concluded the transaction than the Vicar's health took a turn for the better, and he actually survived for thirty years. When at last the living was vacated in 1852, not a single Fellow of Oriel would accept it, but Provost Hawkins ultimately induced his brother-in-law, Mr. Buckle, to undertake the charge. He laboured hard at Twerton for twenty-four years, and was then transferred to Weston-super-Mare, and he ended his life as Canon of Wells. When Mr. Buckle left Twerton the living was very properly given by Oriel to the late Vicar, who had been curate of the parish for some years.

The Rev. E. K. Elliott, who has been Rector of Broadwater (the mother church of Worthing) for nearly fifty-two years, and whose father also held this living for over half a century, is about to resign the benefice, and he has presented his son, the Rev. E. J. Elliott, Vicar of Holy Trinity, Wakefield. The living of Broadwater is of the net value of about £400 a year, with residence.

The Dean and Canons of Christ Church have presented the Rev. Alfred Beedle, Chaplain of Christ Church, and curate of St. Cross, Holywell, Oxford, to the living of Floore, Northamptonshire, which was formerly worth about £800 a year, with residence, but the stipend is now considerably reduced, and the net stipend does not exceed £300 a year.

Canon Scott Holland is to be the Canon-in-residence and Sunday afternoon preacher at St. Paul's Cathedral during January, replacing Chancellor Newbolt, whose claims for a bishopric are being zealously urged upon Mr. Balfour by a number of influential High Churchmen.

A particularly interesting specimen of the begging letter was sent to me some two or three weeks ago. The writer's name is Octavius Drewell. He professes to be an artist, and dates from 442, London Road, South Lowestoft. He does not actually ask for alms—on the contrary, he is at pains to explain that what he requires is professional assistance in the shape of purchase of his pictures, and he encloses with his letter a catalogue of a few paintings by himself "in heavy handsome gilt frames," price from 2 gs. to £3 8s. As the frames alone represent a considerable amount of realisable property, he very carefully explains that only a few of the pictures are already framed, but his frame-maker has promised to supply what is required as soon as he can find a purchaser. The pictures themselves include such familiar subjects as: "Moonrise on the River," £5; "Old Suffolk Water-mill—Sunset," £4 4s.; "View in Norfolk—Woody Landscape," £4 4s.; "Quiet Nook—Cows in Meadow," £5; "Misty Morning at Sea," large, £10; etc., etc. The whole lot may be purchased for £50.

The following extracts will indicate the style of the letter in which these works are offered:—

I hope you will forgive me for writing. It is after seeing your name mentioned in my paper I have decided to do so after much hesitation, in my trouble. I am in no sense whatever intending to beg or anything of that kind.

I am an artist by profession, married, and have one son, and while out sketching on the Norfolk rivers contracted a chill, which ended in a most cruel and protracted illness (inflammation of the lungs and pleurisy combined) lasting over twelve months. This has left me terribly weak, and as yet unable to get to work, as I am so anxious to do. During this long time we soon exhausted what little I had saved, and were compelled to part with almost everything we possessed, just to keep out of debt, and I write to ask if you will help us in our present difficulties by purchasing what few paintings I have on hand. . . .

I am so handicapped it is of no use sending paintings to dealers. They only take advantage of my absence. . . .

I assure you I am induced to write far more for the sake of my dear wife than myself. She has indeed had a cruel time, sometimes nursing day and night, as for weeks I could not even lie down in bed, doing all the house work without any assistance to spare expenses. This, amidst so much anxiety, I grieve to say, has sadly told on her health, and to see her suffer further in the future when so little would avoid it would cause me far more pain than all my illness. I do not ask you to send me anything until you have seen my paintings.

Although I feel sure my paintings would please, if not in every way to your taste I would paint others expressly, and exchange so soon as ever I felt equal to doing justice to same, and guarantee to leave you satisfied. You could lose nothing, as the paintings would improve in value with age.

Letters very much in the same style as this have been written by Mr. Octavius Drewell at intervals for at least ten years past. In 1894 and 1895 he was living at Hammersmith. Strange to say, in December of the last-mentioned year, when writing for the same purpose, he was just recovering from "an exceptionally cruel and protracted illness—inflammation of the lungs and pleurisy combined." He also mentioned on that occasion that he was married and had one son, and explained that he was "in no sense intending to beg." From this it would seem that he keeps a form of letter in stock for use whenever he has one of his cruel and protracted illnesses, from a combination of inflammation of the lungs and pleurisy. In 1895 also he was offering for sale landscapes, entitled "Sunrise on River —Norfolk and Suffolk Broads," and "Sunset," in the same locality. He also had on hand "Morning—Cows in Meadow" and "Evening—View in Norfolk," and "Old Water-mill—Moonlight," from which it would seem that there is as much sameness in the productions of this artist's brush as in those of his pen. I have generally noticed that all artists of this class have a tendency to repeat themselves.

What, however, chiefly strikes me about Mr. Octavius Drewell is his family resemblance to another old friend, best known as Leigh Sampson, though this was only one of about a dozen names under which he took refuge at different periods of his career. Possibly some of my readers may remember that gentleman. It is several years since I heard of him, but for a long period his doings were constantly under notice in the columns of Truth. Very shady doings they were for the most part. The essential fact about all of them was that, while posing as an artist, and trumping up an endless variety of fictions in order to secure patronage for his brush, he was, in fact, nothing but a dealer, who traded in other men's work, and adopted this trick for disposing of it.

One notable feature of Leigh Sampson's art work was his extraordinary facility in disguising his handwriting to suit the different characters he assumed. He sometimes wrote with great effect in the style of a lady. The handwriting of Mr. Octavius Drewell is very striking and characteristic. I am no expert in this line myself, but after looking at all the specimens of Leigh Sampson's work in my possession, I think it by no means impossible that the above letter is the work of the same artist. At any rate, there can be no question that it belongs to the same school, and from their titles I should judge that the pictures do, too. Both of them may possibly be the work of a promising pupil, or one of those "ghosts" who used to work in the Leigh Sampson studio. I need not remind those who are learned in art of the difficulty that frequently arises in distinguishing the work of the master from that of an accomplished pupil, even in the case of the greatest artists. For these reasons I should recommend art patrons to fight shy of Mr. Octavius Drewell's "Moonshine," and kindred productions.

One of my readers forwards a leaflet soliciting help for an orphanage in London, which was handed to him the other day in the stalls of one of the Liverpool theatres. The leaflet announces that "the children will collect before the curtain rises, and during one interval"; which presumably means the children from the homes. In this case it seems that shortly after the leaflets had been distributed a little girl about fifteen years of age came round with a tambourine to make a collection. The orphanage in question is situated at 337, Harrow-road, and the leaflet appealing for help states that "nearly 800 boys and girls from all parts of Great Britain are now in the homes." Beyond the name "Homes for Destitute Children," at the head of the leaflet, no information is given as to the nature of the charity, or who is responsible for the management.

I believe that the homes referred to are under Roman Catholic management, and that there are some three or four of them in and around London, besides the one in the Harrow-road; but if my information is correct, all these homes, including the one in the Harrow-road, contain boys only. In that case neither the wording of the leaflet nor the sending round of little girls to collect in the character of inmates of the home appears particularly straightforward. I should hardly think that the manager of the homes, whoever he may be, has the approval of the authorities of the Roman Catholic Church in taking this course, for the practice of sending little girls round the theatres to beg from the audience is open to very obvious objections. If this is a sample of the discretion with which children are managed in these institutions, I cannot say that I think very much of them.

It is rather odd that any theatrical manager should allow begging of this kind in his theatre; but the practice appears to be common, for the leaflet is evidently worded in such a way that it may be used at any theatre where the manager will give permission. Apart from the introduction of this new terror into theatre-going, it is not obvious why a Liverpool audience should be especially solicited to support a London orphanage. On the one hand, there are, I take it, plenty of orphanages in Liverpool in need of help, and, on the other hand, there are in London enough well-to-do people to support London charities, if the case is put before them in the right way.

I am curious to know more of the "Sunshine Mission," which appears to be managed by Mrs. or Miss Denison, of 5, Queen's-terrace, Otley, Yorkshire. In leaflets which have been distributed by canvassers very many miles from Otley, and, indeed, beyond the boundaries of Yorkshire, Miss Denison announces her desire to "give 100,000 meals this winter to slum children in the following towns:—London, Liverpool, Manchester, Leeds, Sunderland, Sheffield, Newcastle, Birmingham, and Bradford." This desire does the lady much credit, but I cannot say as much for the means taken to realise it, for it appears that a considerable number of collectors have been sent round the country to beg on behalf of the Sunshine Mission, and that they are paid a commission of 25 per cent. on what they collect. In other words, out of every £4 collected £1 goes to the collectors. If the other managerial expenses are on the same scale, it will take a big sum of money to give free meals all through the winter to 100,000 children. While giving the promotors of the Sunshine Mission every credit for their admirable motives, it appears to me high time that some legal restraint was placed on the right of any enthusiastic individual to start begging on these lines for work of which little or nothing is known.

The remarkable facts to which the Prince of Wales drew attention at the meeting of the Council of King Edward's Hospital Fund last week show how much room there is for the exercise of economy in the management of some of the London hospitals. The discrepancies in the prices paid for food, for drugs, and for household articles, at different hospitals, are really amazing. In the matter of the food supply, for example, it has been found that some hospitals pay 3½d. per lb. more than others for mutton of the same quality, 3¼d. per lb. more for beef, 1s. 1d. more for fowls, 2½d. per gallon more for milk, and 7d. per lb. more for tea. If it is a question of the size of the contract, it would surely be practicable, as his Royal Highness suggested, for a group of the smaller hospitals to combine to make a large contract, and then divide up the goods as required. Anyhow, it is evident that the present method of buying in certain hospitals is wasteful and extravagant, and the Council of the Fund are doing good service in impressing the managers with the need for retrenchment.

A Sussex gentleman, viewing with dismay the increasing invasion of the country by motor "scorchers," proposes the establishment of an Anti-speed Motor League, and offers £100 to start it. I do not quite understand from his letter whether his idea is to agitate for a reduction of the present statutory limit of speed for motor cars or only to oppose any further extension of the limit which may be demanded when the question next comes before Parliament. In either case I fear that such an organisation would merely result in a waste of money and energy. Everybody is anxious that a stop should be put to reckless and dangerous driving. The proper way of doing this, however, is by punishing those who so jeopardise the safety of other users of the roads, not by seeking to restrict the speed of every motorist, regardless of the place and the circumstances.

A cavalry officer sends me the following notes on cavalry depots. They seem to me very much to the point. Seeing that one of the cardinal features of Mr. Arnold-Forster's promised reforms is a new system of infantry depots which will be real training schools for recruits, it is impossible to understand why at the same time the number of cavalry depots should be reduced, for there is room for at least three, as my correspondent suggests. Several of the points mentioned below would apply to infantry as well as cavalry depots, more particularly the suggestion as to training cadets at the depots in conjunction with squads for their own regiments:—

The Cavalry Depot at Canterbury has now been done away with. This step seems to me entirely in the wrong direction. In my opinion the number of depots should have been increased to three—one at Aldershot, one at the Curragh, and one at Canterbury. The object of the depots should be to supply regiments abroad with recruits, carefully selected as regards aptitude for riding, physique, and intelligence, and thoroughly trained in the rudiments of a cavalry trooper's business. I would suggest the following as some steps by which these results could be arrived at.

Officers commanding depots should have previously commanded cavalry regiments in a thoroughly satisfactory manner. The length of the appointment should not be more than four years, and the age of the commandant should not exceed forty-eight on appointment. The depot staff should comprise a quarter-master, riding-master, adjutant, and a riding-school staff of N.C.O.s and rough-riders, who should be old soldiers of good character, thoroughly up to the work of training both recruits and young horses.

As regards the recruits, they should be taught (1) to ride; (2) to look after their horses intelligently and efficiently under all possible circumstances; and (3) to take care of their arms and saddlery. Gymnastics and drill could be postponed until they joined their regiments, but they should be put through a course of musketry. The recruit should stay at the depot one year, and if he prove to be a bad rider but a good shot he should be transferred to the infantry. If neither the one nor the other, his services should be dispensed with.

The depot should be run as much as possible on the lines of Sandhurst, where the cadets are treated more or less like school boys, and the recruits should be kept as far apart as possible from soldiers of regiments stationed in the neighbourhood. For the first six months the recruit should be mounted on a quiet, well-behaved troop horse, but for the last six months he should be employed in assisting the riding-master and his staff in training remounts. I know by experience that nothing turns a man into a horseman so thoroughly as putting him on to an untrained animal. The horses so trained should be exchanged periodically for quiet old horses from the cavalry regiments at home.

A year at one of the depots, or perhaps two, if he did not rapidly pick up his work, would be beneficial to the young officer on leaving Sandhurst. He would find a squad of recruits for his own regiment at the depot. He would be placed in charge of it, and be encouraged to take an interest in the men, and if possible he should take a squad of his own recruits with him when he embarks for foreign service.

If army reform is ever to be effective it seems to me that we must start at the very root of the whole matter, and select and train our raw material from the very first.

I have been much impressed by a photograph forwarded to this office representing a Government building which is let for the purpose of an officers' mess to the officers of a wing of the Border Regiment quartered at some hill station in Burma with an undecipherable name. To the British eye the premises resemble an unusually spacious barn or cow-shed, with a thatched roof and sides. The photographer describes it as an ancient, weather-beaten structure, built chiefly of grass matting, with a roof that allows the free passage of the frequent and generous rain showers, and floors that secure the ventilation of the room by cracks anything up to an inch wide between the boards. The interesting point about the thing is that the Government, in its solicitude for the pockets as well as the personal comfort of officers, charges Rs.45 per month for the rent of this commodious edifice. This is really worse than some of the stories one hears about the charge for officers' bungalows in India.

From the same part of the world come the following comments upon recent changes of uniform. The writer jests over his afflictions in the light-hearted way that soldiers do; but it is a most scandalous thing that this tomfoolery is allowed to go on month after month and year after year, in spite of ridicule and protest, notwithstanding all the empty talk about lightening officers' expenses:—

Imagine the feelings of one of your exiled defenders under these circumstances: A friend "in the know" writes from England: "Whatever you do, do not get a frock coat; nobody wears them, and by all accounts they will soon be abolished." Simultaneously, the Commanding Officer intimates that he wishes all officers to provide themselves with the regulation frock coat without delay. Bang goes another eight guineas! Then one gets the drab cloth service cap (or staff cap)—a sweet creation at two guineas only, and so becoming. Upon this, one is immediately told, "Oh, oh, oh! You mustn't wear that, it is obsolete. You must wear your blue one with the khaki cover, of course!" I can tell you we do have a fine time with our emotional frock coats in the golden sunshine of Burma. No frost about our appearance.

The last thing we hear is that the curry-powder service dress is to be changed for an artistic shade of grey. Well, well, "There's changes and changes," as Mrs. Gamp observed, but there's no change, so far as I can see, in the size of tailors' bills. A British officer of to-day feels very much like Mr. and Mrs. Samuel Moss, who announce that "having left off clothing, they now await inspection." If the worst comes to the worst one might retire and start in that line of business. Judging, however, from the prices to sellers, the market for cast-off uniforms is very flat at present.

A subaltern serving in India was lately much gratified by the receipt of the following communication, not having previously been aware that he was a well-known and illustrious person. Even now he does not quite understand to what he is indebted for the invitation, but he suspects that Mr. Jeejeebhoy is engaged in the free portrait business in imitation of the "well-known and illustrious" Tanquerey, of Paris, which, I should think, is very likely:—

Tardeo Castle, Bombay.

My Dear Sir,—I shall be very thankful to you by your kindly obliging me with a copy of your full-sized photograph.

I have already made a vast collection of photos of many well-known and illustrious persons, and I shall be delighted to put yours along with them.—Yours truly, Byramjee Jeejeebhoy.

At one time and another a good deal has been said in these columns as to the length of time, beyond twenty-one years, for which men should be allowed to serve on in the Army. The following particulars given to me respecting three N.C.O.s now serving at the headquarters of one of the regimental districts seems to show that there are cases where men are allowed to continue in the Service on other grounds than those of efficiency. As the particulars are of a somewhat personal nature, I refrain from mentioning any names, but if there is any one at the War Office who care for further and better particulars, I shall be pleased to furnish them:—

1. Quartermaster-sergeant ——. Has twenty-five years' service or over. Is very lame, and made 28 points in his annual course of musketry. He is in receipt of service pay.

2. Quartermaster-sergeant ——. Has over thirty years' service, almost entirely in the orderly-room. No record of his having done a parade of any sort. Manages to walk daily from his house to his chair in the office. Is in receipt of service pay.

3. Colour-sergeant ——. Several years back extended his service beyond twenty-one years. Has a very loud voice, but cannot double, nor march any distance. Combines soldiering with retail trade, his wife keeping a small shop just outside the gate.

There are a good many district headquarters at which similar lists might be compiled, and not a few would probably make a worse show. Why does not the War Office institute a thorough turn-out of all these establishments?

There seems to be a good deal of force in a protest that I have received from Jamaica with reference to the appointment of non-commissioned officers to the post of caterer to the garrison-sergeants' mess, while having other duties to perform. The men have to take this duty by turns, for a month at a time. They all belong to different corps, and in many cases their duties prevent their getting to the mess at all during the day, and in some, e.g., the R.A.M.C., they are often unable to do so at night. The mess is open from 11 a.m. till 11 p.m., so that the caterer ought to pass a good deal of his time there, and his position is the more undesirable because he is held responsible for the money taken, and has to make good any deficiencies that occur. I do not know whether this system is general, but it seems radically wrong.

I was rather surprised to hear the other day that it is in contemplation to appoint a civilian as bandmaster of the Royal Engineers, but on inquiry there seems to be no doubt that this is about to be done. Lieutenant Sommer, the present bandmaster, who has brought the R.E. band to a high pitch of excellence, is shortly retiring. A civilian has been chosen to succeed him, I believe on the advice of Sir Frederick Bridge, and he is now going through a course at Kneller Hall, being given rank as a sapper for the purpose. This arrangement is a very extraordinary one; indeed, the Regulations appear to have been suspended to give effect to it, for I understand it to be laid down that a man must be a non-commissioned officer with at least seven years' total service before he can enter Kneller Hall. It is the reverse of flattering to Army musicians that none of them should be deemed competent to undertake the R.E. bandmastership; and suggests that the country is not getting better value for the money spent on military musical training than for that spent on preparation for war.

Two or three letters have recently reached me from South Africa asking for information about the fate of the Royal Garrison Regiment. I know, of course, as little on this subject as my correspondents. The fate of the regiment is a secret between Mr. Arnold-Forster and the Army Council. It may be that there is no secret at all, for the simple reason that nothing has been definitely decided. But, however, that may be, it does seem a highly inconsiderate proceeding to announce a reform on which the future arrangements in life of a good many hundreds of officers and men depend, and then to hang it up for the best part of a year, leaving the parties in complete ignorance as to what they are to expect and when they are to expect it.

The case of the militia and the volunteers is much the same. Presumably some time after Parliament meets the Secretary of State will announce definitely his intention with regard to all these troops. But if all these matters are to be left in obscurity till then, what point was there in making the announcement twelve months earlier? It is hoped that Mr. Arnold-Forster will not announce any more reforms until he sees his way to carry them out, and to do so within a reasonable time.

A non-commissioned officer writes from the Transvaal protesting against soldiers being compelled to travel third class on South African railways. He points out that the third class is, at any rate in Natal, practically used by Kaffirs only, and any white man travelling in a carriage with Kaffirs would feel degraded in his own eyes, and would be regarded with contempt by his fellows. That this is so is, I suppose, beyond question. It may be a melancholy thing that such feelings should prevail between different races of mankind; but there they are, and as long as they are there, to compel soldiers to do what no white man will voluntarily do, seems unfair to the soldier, and impolitic from the point of view of the Government. My correspondent asserts that soldiers travelling on the Natal railways are subject to every kind of slight and insult from railway officials and passengers, and are treated, in fact, more or less like Kaffirs. If the Government sets the example of so treating them, what else can it expect?

It is deplorable to read that the contempt and loathing manifested by the whites in South Africa towards the blacks is extended indiscriminately to Asiatics whose skins are not of the right colour. Practically, a South African colonist seems unable to distinguish between a nigger and a Hindu, although the latter may be by comparison with the British colonist an educated gentleman. In a recent letter from Natal the writer describes how he saw a party of white men board an electric tram-car in Durban. The car was full, and among the passengers were three Hindus. All three were forcibly hauled out of their seats by the Englishmen, who threatened to pitch them off the car if they made any resistance, and then appropriated their places. My correspondent, being a stranger, was so disgusted at this assault, that he was disposed to interfere, but refrained on finding that neither the conductor nor any one else took the slightest notice of the incident.

A recent letter from Burma describes the very scandalous conditions under which troops are conveyed by river in that country. The troops are stowed on two-decked flats, towed by a steamer which carries the officers. A couple of these flats are considered sufficient for a regiment over 800 strong. The men are packed so tightly that at night there is little more than room for all of them to lie down upon the decks; and the necessary accommodation for cooking and all other purposes is of the most primitive and limited description. The 1st Middlesex Regiment, which travelled from Rangoon to Thayetmyo last month, was eight days on the voyage, and during this time the men were only once allowed on shore. The conditions of life on board under these circumstances are not merely uncomfortable, but disgusting and insanitary; and there can be no excuse whatever for requiring troops to perform long journeys under such circumstances in time of peace.

A bitter growl reaches me from Mauritius, with reference to the detention on that island of a number of time-expired men of the Royal Engineers. How long they have been there does not appear, but as the men in question served in the South African war, it is evident that they must have been abroad a very long time. A few weeks ago a ship called at Mauritius, by which the sappers had been led to expect that reliefs would arrive, and the men's transfer documents were actually got ready on that assumption; but it turned out that reliefs had come for every other corps on the island except the R.E. Perhaps the War Office has forgotten their existence. Knowing what the War Office is, I often wonder whether a regiment or company ever gets mislaid in some out of the way corner of the world, and what its ultimate fate is under those circumstances.

An Anglo-Indian correspondent sends me an edifying story of an official squabble over a question of precedence which arose in connection with the annual conference of the leading lights of the I.C.S. in the Central Provinces. It seems that one of the little tin gods took dire offence because his name figured below instead of above some one else's in a list drawn up by the junior civilian who was acting as secretary of the Committee of Management. It was an insignificant and innocent mistake, but it caused no end of bother, and the unhappy secretary was severely reprimanded. Judging from what my correspondent says, this storm in a teacup is an appropriate incident of the conference. Ostensibly this gathering is held to enable members of the Indian Civil Service in the Central Provinces to exchange views on matters of administration, and on that understanding the week or so it occupies is not deducted from their annual leave. In point of fact, however, it is not a meeting for the discussion of public business, but for the pursuit of pleasure, those attending it devoting themselves almost exclusively to the enjoyment of dinners, dances, races, gymkhanas, cricket matches, etc.

Meanwhile much of the machinery of the Government is put out of gear by the absence of important officials from their posts. In some places trials of civil and criminal cases have to be postponed, the tours of their districts by Deputy Commissioners are suspended, and in innumerable ways the administration suffers. The officers of other departments of the public service are not permitted to indulge in a week's holiday on the pretence of taking part in a conference, and it is not creditable to the Administration of the Central Provinces that this abuse should be tolerated in the case of the Civil Service.

A reference some time ago to the exclusion of Indians from the Mall in Simla during the hours when Europeans congregate there elicited a defence of the order on the ground that it only applied to coolies and other natives of low degree and objectionable habits. It will be interesting to learn what justification is attempted for the regulation which, according to the Bengalee, is now being enforced in the Red-road, Calcutta. Here, at any rate, it is not simply a question of the exclusion of the ill-clad and malodorous coolie, for recently a native gentleman of wealth and position, who left his carriage and pair to take a stroll in this fashionable promenade, was peremptorily ordered away by a European police constable. The constable stated that the Commissioner of Police had prohibited the use of the road by Indian gentlemen. In matters of this kind British administration in India appears to be distinctly reactionary, and measures are adopted which years ago would have been deemed odious and contemptible exhibitions of racial prejudice.

Several letters have reached me from members of the Railway Clearing House Superannuation Fund in reference to the alarming report of the actuaries which has been discussed in one of the daily papers. The Fund is maintained under the sanction of an Act of Parliament, partly by compulsory deductions from the salaries of some 15,000 clerks and officials, and partly by the contributions of the railway companies, whose representatives have the controlling power over the management. Ten years back a surplus of £98,000 existed. A change was then made in the method of computing pensions, and the disastrous result is that this surplus has now been converted into a prospective deficiency, estimated by the actuaries at no less than £483,000.

Under the scheme adopted in 1893, pensions have been based on the average of the pensioner's salary for the last seven years of his service, instead of on the average for the whole period of his employment, which was the former basis of computation. The new scheme applied, of course, to all members, but it is asserted—indeed, it seems indisputable—that it has worked out enormously to the advantage of the higher-paid officials, one or two of whom have retired and drawn as much as £2,000 a year from the fund. With their last cheques all the pensioners received notice that their pensions will be forthwith reduced. It would appear, however, that the reductions now recommended by the actuaries will only mean a postponement of the difficulty which the managers of the fund have to meet. "In all probability," the actuaries say, "five years hence it will be found that the deficiency still exists, even if it has not increased, and to preserve the stability of the fund it must then be dealt with." With all respect to the actuaries, this proposal for putting off the evil day seems scarcely sound or business-like. In justice to those who will be compelled to go on contributing to the fund the crisis surely ought to be dealt with now. There is said to be a possibility that the railway companies concerned will come to the rescue by guaranteeing the solvency of the fund if the reductions suggested are agreed to, and it is to be hoped that this will be done.

The ratepayers of Hereford have just had a costly experience of the unreliability of building estimates. The Corporation decided to build a new Town Hall, and the ratepayers were assured that the total expenditure would not exceed £25,000. Now that the hall is erected the unwelcome disclosure has been made that the contractors for the building will have to be paid "extras" to the amount of no less than £5,700, chiefly in respect of "additional foundations" and a "basement story" not included in the contract. Estimates for public buildings are almost invariably exceeded, but such a huge excess as this seems inexcusable.

The prosecution of Sir William Grantham by the Chailey District Council is an idiotic proceeding from beginning to end, and the abortive verdict—or whatever it is to be called—of the Lewes Bench is quite in harmony with all that preceded it. As far as I can make out, the learned Judge was "hauled before the beaks" solely for the offence of lèse majesté against the Chailey Council, and even this offence was not proved, for Sir William seems to have done everything that a man could be expected to do in the way of showing deference to the local Bumbles. There does not seem to have been any serious attempt to prove that the cottages which Sir William proposed to erect were structurally defective, and it seems to have been proved that the plans conformed to the by-laws. The question would never have been heard of at all, but for the fact that the District Council did not consider Sir William's plans were drawn with such scientific precision or technical skill, as is requisite in documents deposited before so august a tribunal as theirs. It is a great pity, therefore, that the Lewes Bench did not dismiss the summons, by way of a lesson to all such swollen-headed Jacks-in-Office.

The public, however, are indebted to Sir William Grantham for the fight he has made in this case—no doubt very much against his own inclination—because it has served to draw universal attention to the important matter of rural housing. The discussion to which the case has given rise shows clearly that the existing by-laws of the local authorities, for the form of which the Local Government Board is responsible, tend to defeat rather than gain the end which ought to be the only one in view, namely, the provision of decent habitable cottages for rural labourers. No one disputes—certainly I should be the last to do so—the need for some official authority to stand between the speculative builder and the unfortunate victims who have no choice but to inhabit such houses as he provides for them. It may be that in these days, when the cost of building is so high, there is need for such an authority even to look after landlords, who may be tempted to cut down expenditure to the point at which the sanitary qualities of the building begin to suffer. But the existing by-laws go far beyond this. They seem to be mainly modelled upon what has been found necessary for the safeguarding of the public health in towns, and to have little intelligent consideration for the totally different conditions of life in rural districts. The result of these pedantic rules, coupled with the progressive rise in the cost of building, is rapidly bringing about the result that the rural labourer can find nowhere to live, notwithstanding the depopulation of the country districts.

Mr. Jesse Fletcher, proprietor of the Great North Magazine, River View, Seacombe, Liverpool, turned up in the West Bromwich County Court last week as plaintiff in an action against a local firm of ironfounders. I have frequently explained the method on which Fletcher conducts his so-called magazine. He writes to a tradesman or manufacturer intimating that he will be pleased to publish an article descriptive of his business or works. No direct charge is to be made for the article, but if the tradesman or manufacturer desires its appearance, he is asked to buy a certain number of copies of the magazine, and also to pay what is represented as the cost of the blocks to illustrate the article. As a matter of fact, however, the blocks are charged for at a price per square inch so much in excess of the actual cost that it gives Fletcher a very handsome profit on the whole transaction.

In the case at West Bromwich the defendants were led to believe that altogether they would not have to pay Fletcher more than £10, but after the article was published he sent in a bill for no less than £46, of which £3 15s. was for 100 copies of his precious magazine, and the rest for blocks at the exorbitant price of 1s. 6d. per square inch. It was to recover this £46 that he brought his action. The defendants alleged that the order they gave was obtained by fraudulent misrepresentations with regard both to the extent and character of the circulation of the Great North Magazine and the cost of the blocks; and the jury came to the conclusion that such misrepresentations had been made. Judgment was accordingly given for the defendants, with costs—a result which should encourage other parties who have been bamboozled by Mr. Jesse Fletcher to refuse payment of his bill. The business which he carries on was characterised by the defendant's solicitor as an "advertisement swindle," and that is what it really is.

A very harsh sentence by the Daventry Divisional J.P.s was brought to light at an inquest on the body of a prisoner in Northampton Gaol last week. Being very ill and destitute, and failing to get charitable relief, the deceased, an elderly tramp, broke a window in order that he might be arrested. The seriousness of his illness was apparent to everybody, and the police suggested to the magistrates that the man should be discharged and removed to the workhouse infirmary. Instead of taking this humane course, however, the Daventry Dracos committed the poor fellow to Northampton Gaol for fourteen days. This necessitated a twelve miles' railway journey which he was manifestly unfit to bear, and the result was that by the time he reached the gaol his condition had become very much worse, and two days later he died. In view of these facts, the magistrates have certainly been fortunate in escaping with a mild censure from the coroner's jury.

In pleasant contrast to this merciless sentence at Daventry was the action of the Norwich City Bench the other day, when two tramps were charged with refusing to do their allotted task at the workhouse. The allotted task was the breaking of 7 cwt. of stone, and it was obvious that both the prisoners were physically incapable of getting through such a job. There are plenty of magistrates who readily pass sentences of imprisoment in cases of this kind, regardless of the health and strength of the accused—indeed, the report of the Commissioners of Prisons calls attention every year to the lack of discrimination and humanity which is displayed in punishing men charged with this offence. The Norwich Bench, to their credit, discharged these prisoners, and at the same time expressed the opinion that more discretion ought to be shown in the allotment of tasks to "casuals" at the workhouse. The point is one that has been repeatedly pressed upon the attention of Bumble, but he declines to make any change, though it is clearly cruel to inflict the one uniform task upon all sorts and conditions of men.

My attention has been called by several of my readers to the observations of a Mr. Oswald Hanson, in some recent proceedings at West London Police-court. The charge was one of assault, brought by a man named Allen Davis, of 524, High-road, Chiswick, and, in reply to an allusion to what has been said in Truth about this individual, Mr. Hanson, his solicitor, observed that his client paid no attention to "nonsense written by irresponsible idiots in an irresponsible paper." I hope that this man of law has not advised his client that Truth is an irresponsible paper; but if he has, Davis had better look for another lawyer. It is news to me that such a thing as an irresponsible paper exists; at any rate I have never yet known any lawyer suggest that Truth was in that blessed condition. So far as I know, the only people who can fling about defamatory observations without being held responsible are advocates in law-courts; and the only people who abuse their irresponsible position are police-court solicitors.

The man Davis, on the foregoing occasion, alleged that a schoolmaster who had been taken in by one of his advertisements, and had come to the shop to try to get his money back, had assaulted him. The schoolmaster replied that Davis was drunk and had assaulted him most savagely. Two independent witnesses corroborated this allegation. The magistrate contented himself with observing that there had evidently been an affray between the two men, and, as the defendant had apparently got the worst of it, and had merely committed the trivial assault of pushing his bicycle against the complainant's legs, he did no more than bind him over for six months. It is a wonder to my mind that men like Davis, whose trade consists in palming off rubbishy goods by means of deceptive advertisements, do not get assaulted by their customers a good deal oftener.

By way of marking the Christmas season I have this week again proclaimed an amnesty for the Great Unpaid; being inspired by the hope that they, on their part, have exhibited a similar tenderness in their decisions in this time of peace and goodwill.

At Birmingham Assizes the other day, Mr. Justice Channell remarked that not a single verdict in the civil actions in his court had satisfied him. One of the jurymen on whom this rebuke fell, writes to me in a very impenitent mood. He says he is not at all surprised that the Judge was dissatisfied with the verdicts; what does astonish him is that anybody should expect any better result from a system under which men are torn from their own business for days together, and called upon to apply their minds, without fee or reward, to the settlement of other people's disputes. In his own case he had to leave his business for three days, and he argues that if satisfactory verdicts are desired jurymen must be suitably remunerated for their services. I suppose that I ought to lecture this gentleman on the duties of citizenship, and to remind him that trial by jury is one of the most sacred of our institutions, the palladium of our liberties, and so on. But really I have a great deal of sympathy with his views. To most men, service on a jury must always be inconvenient and irksome, and to many it means a serious pecuniary loss. The reasonableness of allowing a fee is already recognised in the case of special juries, and in fairness common jurymen should also be paid.

I have before me some further correspondence, in which Mr. H. M. Hardy, of the Hardy Machine and Woollen Company, Manchester, describes himself as "the sole owner of this business," says that he has been there for months managing every department, and denies that he has any partners. He also emphatically repudiates having ever had any business dealings with a former customer of the defunct Home and Colonial Knitting Company, of London, adding: "You will find that it is quite useless to try and frighten money out of me by threats." I would suggest to Hardy that he should explain why under these circumstances he promptly paid up claims which were made against his firm in respect of dealings with the said Home and Colonial Knitting Company. He would also do well to explain at the same time what is the precise connection of the two men Bennett and Hunter with the Hardy Machine and Woollen Company.

As my readers are aware, Bennett and Hunter are somewhat under a cloud as vendors of knitting machines for home employment, in consequence of a County Court Judge having stigmatised the business of the Home and Colonial Knitting Company as a "gross and cruel fraud." Mr. Horace M. Hardy must clearly understand that it is not to his advantage to have these gentlemen associated with the Hardy Machine and Woollen Company. It must be still more disadvantageous for him to be personally suspected of being either Bennett or Hunter. Under these circumstances I once again suggest to Hardy that he should explain what Bennett and Hunter have to do with the Hardy Company, and also why the Hardy Company has on former occasions discharged liabilities incurred by Bennett and Hunter in the course of their previous swindle.

A correspondent forwards an interesting collection, made during the last five years, of advertisements and letters in connection with the second-hand piano trick. The collection appears to relate exclusively to the individual who carries on this business in the name of "Reginald Gratton," from various addresses in the S.E. postal district. The attentive reader of TRUTH knows all about Gratton, as well as other parties in the same line of business in other districts of London—all of them, of course, agents for unknown makers, posing as private individuals who are disposing of their pianos second-hand. This collection, however, affords striking proof of the extent to which this trick is practised, no doubt most profitably. Among the addresses used during the last five years are 85, Catford-hill, 193, New Cross-gate, 191, Queen's-road, Peckham, Morgan's Library, Bushey-green, S.E., and 358, Stanstead-road, Catford, which appears to be Gratton's latest address. The different characters assumed by the agent may be seen from the following extracts:—

Medical gentlemen leaving for South Africa offers supremely beautiful walnut and marqueterie piano, etc.

Bank clerk, out of berth, desires immediate buyer for most superb seven-octave check-action walnut-wood piano. Exquisitely designed marqueterie front; brilliant tone, etc.

Lady going to join her husband in Bombay, offers supremely elegant upright iron grand, etc.

Lady nurse, leaving for Johannesburg, offers for sale supremely beautiful upright iron grand, with all latest improvements, etc.

Through failure of bank, gentleman must sell lovely upright grand piano, etc.

Lady leaving to join her husband in South Africa, offers supremely elegant upright iron grand, etc. . . .

Gentleman leaving for foreign mission work, must dispose of supremely beautiful walnut and marqueterie, etc. . . .

Lady leaving to join her husband, a minister in India, seeks purchaser for lovely walnut and marqueterie, etc. . . .

Side by side with these advertisements it is interesting to read Gratton's answers to correspondents. His descriptions of the instrument are almost always the same, and the maker is in all cases Rowland Warner of Kentish Town, but formerly of and more recently of Stoke Newington. The condition of the piano is always "same as new," or "just as new," which is no doubt true enough, the instrument being sent direct from the works to Gratton's quarters for the purpose of sale. In 1899 Gratton was acting for "my sister, Mrs. Gould," who was "away at mother's home in Scotland." In 1902 the alleged owner of the piano was "my sister, Miss L. Gratton," while so recently as last month the lady had become once more "my sister, Mrs. Gould," and was again "away at mother's home in Scotland." It is worthy of note that nearly all the advertisements above mentioned appeared in the same newspaper, and it seems to me that newspaper managers might with advantage exercise a little more discretion about the publication of advertisements of this character, the trick being notorious.

ROYAL SOCIETY FOR PREVENTION OF CRUELTY TO ANIMALS, Upwards of 8,000 convictions annually. Complaints marked "Private" absolutely confidential. Anonymous complaints are treated as WASTE PAPER.—SECRETARY, 105, Jermyn-st., London.

I spoke last week of the scandalous puffing in certain provincial newspapers of the disreputable quack who travels about the country under the name of "Professor Richard." I am indebted to the Army and Navy Gazette and one or two other contemporaries for information which shows very usefully how this puffing is brought about. A printed communication is sent round to the Press, signed by Mrs. Alice Renault, of 57, Chantry-road, Southampton. In it Mrs. Renault states that, having been "almost miraculously cured," she would like to give publicity to the means by which the miracle was wrought, "if you could of your good nature publish the following paragraph gratis in your widely-circulated journal." She adds: "Could I afford it, I would have been only too pleased to pay for the favour." The following paragraph purports to be an extract from the Midland Free Press, of Leicester, and begins in this strain:—

PROFESSOR RICHARD'S TRIUMPH.
THE QUEEN AND THE DEAF WOMAN.

Some of our readers will be interested to learn that Professor Richard, the Medical Electrician who recently visited Southampton for the treatment of patients, has lately been attracting a good deal of attention. According to the local newspaper report Queen Alexandra was interested in the case of a poor woman, named Alice Renault, of 57, Chantry Road, Southampton, who had suffered from deafness for seven years, etc., etc.

There is a great deal more in this strain, but it gives little or no information, beyond the interesting fact that Mrs. Renault reported her experience to the Queen, and received an acknowledgment of her communication.

Without going into further details, it will be seen that the whole thing is a piece of elaborate "fake," with the object of obtaining a free advertisement for Richard. It is, of course, Richard, not Mrs. Renault, who is sending out this letter and the accompanying paragraph; and he gives himself away hopelessly by making the woman say that she cannot afford to pay for an advertisement, seeing the amount she must have expended on printing and distributing these circulars. That they have been distributed widely is evident from the fact that the very envelope in which they are posted bears the printed words: "To the Editor of ——." I have seen this advertisement in a number of papers in different parts of England, from which it would appear that, transparent as the trick is, it is deep enough to impose upon a good many people who are considered competent to edit newspapers. Really this is very humiliating.

No doubt the worthy Richard is aware by this time that I have once more got my eye upon him. I beg him, therefore, to note that if I catch him again at his swindling tricks I shall be under the painful necessity of calling the attention of the police to his past record, and suggesting that he should be turned out of any town in which he makes his appearance, which has already been his fate in India and the Colonies. Out of mistaken consideration for his age and misfortunes I have for a long time allowed him to go on his way without interference, on his solemn promise that he would do nothing open to objection. He appears to be grossly abusing this indulgence, and if he does not drop his roguery spontaneously a little compulsion will have to be employed.

Among a batch of home-employment circulars sent to me the other day I came across a new name, that of "F. Morgan and Co.," 233, Lavender Hill, S.W. The name is the only novelty about the circular, which merely promises payment for envelope addressing, and requires a remittance of 1s. 6d. as a "condition precedent." Either Morgan and Co. is identical with that old-established firm, T. Smith and Co., of Elm Lodge, Southall, or Morgan has been making very free with Smith's stock-in-trade, for the front page of his circular is identical with the front page of Smith's, word for word, and the family likeness continues throughout. The second page in both of them contains a batch of alleged testimonials, headed: "Proof—As the genuineness of our offer has on different occasions been called in question by prejudiced persons, etc., etc.," and the only wonder is that the same testimonials are not reproduced in both circulars.

However, all the firms in this shady line of business imitate one another very closely in the wording of their circulars. Several paragraphs, both in Smith's and Morgan's circulars, may be found also in that of H. E. Nicholls and Co., of 10, Featherstone-buildings, Holborn. This is another home-employment "proposition" of the envelope-addressing class. It would not surprise me to learn that all three firms are the same individual. At any rate, all three should be equally shunned by persons in search of work, and, I may add, by the managers of newspaper advertisement offices. Both Morgan's and Smith's advertisements offer a salary of £3 weekly, or 10s. daily, which is enough in itself to stamp the thing as humbug. Nicholls and Co. are more modest, though probably not less delusive. Their advertisement only offers 30s. a week.

There has been a wholesale distribution in India lately of books of tickets for a racing sweepstake which is represented as being held for the benefit of the Young People's Club, Bajeh Shibpur, Howrah. An accompanying circular says that the object of the club is "to encourage the moral and intellectual culture of young men" at Bajeh Shibpur. It would seem, however, that the Babu promoter of the scheme also has at heart the moral and intellectual culture of the wider public whom he invites to join in his gamble, for he gives prominence to an announcement that all persons subscribing for two complete books of tickets (thirty-six at two annas each) "are supplied with a copy of weekly newspapar (sic) TRUTH free of charge, and disposers of more than two books are supplied with additional copies of TRUTH if so desired." Naturally, I am loth to say a word in disparagement of any proposal to increase the circulation of TRUTH. To prevent any misunderstanding, however, I think is desirable to explain that I know nothing of this scheme, and to add that people in India who want to read TRUTH will probably find it more satisfactory to subscribe in the ordinary way.

My latest information respecting the swindle calling itself the United Press Association, of 15 and 16, St. Dunstan's-hill, E.C., comes from a gentleman who answered one of the advertisements in a South African paper. Happily he was a cautious gentleman. Noticing that the circulars stated that "483 newspapers are members of the United Press Association in Great Britain," he wrote and asked for the names of the papers referred to. Naturally the information was not forthcoming; and the reply was simply an insolent letter intimating that the U.P.A. cared not whether their correspondent joined them or not. Notwithstanding that, within a few weeks one of the usual "follow-up" letters was addressed to the same person, offering him instruction, at reduced terms, and pointing out that these terms are peculiarly reasonable, "when it is considered that our instructors must possess the highest degree of skill and be paid salaries accordingly."

As it appears that there are a great many people who are still in the dark as to the character of this business, it seems desirable to point out again that the whole thing is an impudent "ramp," which was only started in this country after it had been squelched, largely by the action of the Press, in America. It is not necessary to look further than the headings of the stationery now in use for evidence of the dishonesty of the thing. To the unsuspecting observer the concern appears to be described as "The Press Association," the word "United" being inscribed in a flourish up above, without any indication that it is part of the title. The intention, of course, is to suggest that the concern is identical with the old-established news and literary agency which is universally known under the name of the Press Association.

Again, below the title of the Association appears the announcement: "Political, general, and dramatic news service, by cable, mail, and stereotype," and the statement that "483 newspapers are members of the United Press Association in Great Britain," is obviously intended to be read with these words, and to convey to the ignorant boys and girls to whom the advertisements are addressed that this is a bona-fide news and literary agency, doing a very large business. In point of fact all that it does is to retail a few utterly worthless hints and instructions to the victims, under the pretence of teaching them journalism. It seems to me that the whole thing is sufficiently fraudulent to be reached by the criminal law, if the victims would bestir themselves for the purpose. I might add that the gang engaged in this business combine with it a medical quack business, of much the same character, under the titles of "The Diabetic Institute," and "The Diabetes Flour Company."

What astonishes me about the advertisements of the United Press Association is that any respectable newspaper should be found ready to publish them. This is not a case where any newspaper can plead ignorance of the nature of the advertisements offered to it, for every practical journalist must know perfectly well that the pretence of training young people in journalism by correspondence is nonsense. One might suppose that any journalist with a regard for the credit of his own profession would do his best to save beginners from being trapped by such devices; but as a matter of fact there are papers in all parts of the Empire—though I am glad to say they seem to be more now in the Colonies than in the United Kingdom—who are ready to play the game of these impostors as long as the requisite payment for the purpose is forthcoming.

Cannot the Commissioners of Inland Revenue take steps to prevent the improper use of the name of the Inland Revenue—to say nothing of the Royal Arms—by such harpies as the man Todd, otherwise Leicester and Co., of Twickenham? One of the tricks of this individual in bamboozling servant girls, farm labourers, and other innocents into the purchase of cheap watches at excessive prices is to offer a "warranty" printed on blue paper with the Royal arms and the words "Licensed by his Majesty's Inland Revenue" in bold type at the top. There is not the least doubt that this "warranty," like the bogus County Court notices issued in connection with the same business, is got up to impress ignorant people with the idea that it is an official document, and the Inland Revenue should surely be able to stop such an imposition. Todd, of course, only possesses the ordinary licence to deal in plate, and in view of the misuse which he makes of the fact, it is a matter for consideration at Somerset House whether this licence ought not to be withdrawn.

A good example of the mischief done by this kind of trading with servant girls is given by a correspondent in Lancashire. A girl in his service was humbugged by a travelling agent into buying a "gold" watch at £3 15s.—payable by 5s. a month. The vendors were a firm in Bristol; he does not mention the name, but I think I know it. The watch was valued subsequently, and pronounced to be worth 12s. 6d. It was returned to the vendors, and sent back by them to the girl, but not accepted when delivered; and though representatives of the firm called and endeavoured to frighten the girl into keeping the thing, they fortunately failed. Now, this girl was paying out of her small wages £1 a month for the support of an invalid mother, and had she kept to the bargain into which she was tricked, the payment must have come out of the mother's money. No doubt this is often the result when girls are tricked into buying goods of the rapacious swindlers in this line of business.

My attention was called the other day to a catalogue of modern books distributed by a firm called Holland Brothers, of Birmingham, and I should think that the Birmingham police might make a little inspection of this firm's premises with advantage, for though it is quite true that the greater part of the stock offered is unobjectionable, interspersed with it is a great deal of literature of the lowest class, including several of the "privately printed" works, which are usually offered from Paris rather than Birmingham. One of these catalogues reaches me from a junior master in a public school to whom it was addressed—a fact which is not insignificant.

Esteemed Recipient,—I want the opportunity to grow hair upon your head. I know that a person of your excellent position in life can fully appreciate the many beneficial results that would follow the attainment of the growth of nice natural hair.

This is the exordium of a communication addressed to a young lady aged eleven years by the individual calling himself "John Craven-Burleigh," whose advertisements are to be seen in every direction. Like most little girls of her age, the "esteemed recipient" has no opening for any additional growth of hair on her head; and it is a mystery how gentry of the John Craven-Burleigh class can get at the names of children for the purpose of such circulars. The document goes on to inform the "esteemed recipient" that John Craven-Burleigh has decided to make her "a special offer" to the following effect:—

I purpose selling you three of the large 5s. size boxes at half-price, namely, 7s. 6d., and I guarantee to you that if this quantity is not sufficient to produce hair one inch in length, I will continue to supply you with my pomade until the growth is actually accomplished. . . .

The precise value of this guarantee may be judged from the request made in a P.S.—"Please return this letter with your reply." While making his "special offer"—which, of course, is contained in a printed circular sent out broadcast, and not intended for little girls of eleven years old—the advertiser is careful to take steps to deprive his bald-headed dupes of any evidence that the offer was ever made.

"John Craven-Burleigh" is one of the numerous trade aliases of a very 'cute Yankee named Scott, who has for the last few years found this country a more comfortable residence than his own, and has been preying on the more gullible section of the British public by "smart advertising" of the most undesirable American pattern. He is most familiar under the name of "Symonds' London Stores," and simultaneously with the above communication the little girl receives another from the establishment, which shows how closely the two concerns are connected. In the second document the "Esteemed Recipient"—Scott's mode of address does not vary with his aliases—is asked, "Do you want a bicycle?" and is led to suppose that she may acquire such an article "free" by wasting her time over one of the Symonds' Stores bogus competitions, with which readers of Truth are already familiar.

Further evidence of the insidious blarney with which children, or other persons of imperfect understanding, are gammoned in these circulars may be seen in the following passage:—

You may wonder why it is that we select you as a person to whom we offer the privilege of gaining such a gift as a ten-guinea bicycle by this competition. The reason is that you will naturally prove very useful to us, as you will speak about us to your friends. We issue several catalogues, and deal by post all over the United Kingdom.

The last statement is doubtless true, and the fact shows how desirable it is that the "mail order" business in the United Kingdom should be subjected to some of those wholesome restrictions applied to it in the United States, with the result that Yankees of the Scott type find it prudent to transfer their operations to this side of the Atlantic. This is one of the cases in which I am all in favour of restricting American imports.

The other day a gentleman who had passed a shorthand examination, and whose name had been mentioned in that connection in the Phonetic Journal, was gratified by the receipt of a communication from the "Society of Commerce," of Dollar, N.B., inviting him to become a fellow of that society. As the communication intimated that the fellowship would cost him a guinea, and as he was unable to learn anything about the Society of Commerce, he applied to me for advice before accepting the proffered distinction. I know nothing of this society myself, nor have I been able to find any one who does. So far as I can gather from the literature accompanying the above communication, the society consists of three gentlemen—Mr. Robert Mackenzie, M.A., who is President; Mr. Alexander L. Curr, of St. Andrews, who is called the Registrar; and Mr. J. B. Wyles, of Dollar, N.B., who is the General Secretary and Treasurer. These gentlemen are, of course, within their rights in offering to confer fellowships on their fellow creatures, but only a hopeless flat would pay them a guinea for this compliment.

Mr. Carl Hentschel calls my attention to an experiment tried the other day at the annual dinner of the Bartholomew Club, and I think I cannot do better than commend it to the attention of all gentlemen who get up public dinners. On this occasion all the speeches were "taken as read"—that is to say, they were printed in a little book, which was distributed to the guests. This is nothing less than "epoch-making." If the idea is generally adopted, as I sincerely hope it may be, a public dinner may cease to be a terror to the people who have to make the speeches, and to the people who have to listen to them. It also seems likely to tend to the elevation of after-dinner oratory. At any rate, the Bartholomew Club speeches, so far as I have studied them, reach a much higher standard than one is accustomed to on these occasions. This bears out what I said the other day as to the difference between spoken orations and those which are carefully written out and prepared for publication in book form.

There are signs at last of an awakening in Trinidad and Jamaica to the injustice of the system of coolie immigration which burdens the community at large with a heavy expenditure for the special benefit of the sugar planters. It has often been pointed out in Truth that the system under which men and women from East India are transported to the West Indies to become "indentured" labourers on the sugar estates is virtually one of slavery, and not infrequently reproduces the same abuses of cruelty and oppression. But the agitation now arising in the Colonies where the system prevails is based on economic grounds, rather than on any humanitarian consideration for the coolies, or any objection on principle to the practice of slavery.

In the Trinidad Legislative Council recently a motion for the importation of 2,400 coolies from India in the coming year evoked a vigorous, though unsuccessful, protest. The Council were reminded that in the past four years the colony had spent upwards of £200,000 on coolie immigration, solely in the interests of the sugar planters. Other employers have no difficulty in obtaining the labour they require in the island, and the sugar planters would have as little if they would pay a fair wage. Not unnaturally, however, they are disinclined to do this so long as a benevolent administration is good enough to provide them with alien coolies, who are "indentured" to work on their estates for a term of five years at what are practically starvation wages.

The fact that any opposition whatever should have been offered to the motion in the Trinidad Council is full of significance, for the sugar planters wield so much influence over the administration of the colony that such motions have usually been passed nem. con. In Jamaica also people are beginning to cry out against the system of coolie immigration. That colony has not merely a sufficiency but a superabundance of local labour; yet, while the native unemployed question is becoming more acute, coolies are still being imported to work on the sugar estates. For years the proprietors of the West Indian sugar estates wailed about the bounties their European competitors were getting, and at last their lamentations were heeded by Mr. Chamberlain, the outcome being that disastrous Brussels Convention for which every English family is now paying so dearly. But all the time the West Indian planters were receiving a very substantial indirect bounty in the shape of this system of State-supported coolie immigration, and though bounties elsewhere have been abolished, this is still being continued. It is no wonder that the inhabitants of the colonies concerned are growing restive under this imposition, more especially as the profits of the sugar industry are mainly pocketed by absentee landlords. The wonder rather is that the system has been tolerated so long.

By way of showing that some of the performances of the highly salaried magistrates in the Transvaal equal those of our own Great Unpaid, one of my Colonial readers sends me an account of a recent decision in a case of cruelty to a horse at Potchefstroom. The horse would not or could not pull a load, whereupon the driver, an Englishman in the employ of a local brewery company, first thrashed the animal, and then burnt it under the stomach and under the tail with a shovelful of live coals. The horse was badly injured, but though the defendant pleaded guilty, the acting resident magistrate discharged him without any penalty. The Transvaal Government seems to have regarded this decision with approval, for the magistrate in question has since been promoted to a more lucrative post at Pretoria.

When a direct attack fails it is the practice of military strategists to concentrate their efforts on some outlying position which commands the fortress which they are seeking to capture. So it is when politicians are attempting to hustle a country into a policy of which it does not approve. Mr. Chamberlain makes the direct attack upon the Free Trade fortress, though his tactical idea seems to be that the walls, like those of Jericho, can be overturned by the braying of brazen trumpets. In the meantime, while Mr. Chamberlain is braying and trumpeting, Mr. Balfour seeks to effect an entrance by more artful manœuvres. With this object he proposed to call a Colonial Conference, at which the merits of Free Trade and Protection are to be discussed in the abstract. He knows, however, that the country would look upon this as merely an attempt to insert the thin end of the wedge, so his latest move is to wheedle the country into assenting to such a conference, on the ground that it will afford an opportunity of persuading the Colonies to pay their quota towards the cost of the Navy.

According to Mr. Balfour, circumstances render it necessary that we should maintain our present expenditure on the Navy, and in all probability we shall have to increase it in future. He admits that we cannot afford this, so he would have us go, hat in hand, to the Colonies, imploring them to relieve us of a portion of our burden. Mr. Chamberlain proclaims that if we do not tax food for their benefit, the Colonies will separate from us, and that the Empire will perish by disintegration. Mr. Balfour proclaims that the Empire will be destroyed by a foreign attack, unless the Colonies will pay for its defence. Our only chance of safety, therefore, lies in a conference, at which Mr. Balfour will coax the Colonials to share the cost of the Navy, while Mr. Chamberlain will arrange with them taxes on our food for their benefit, while allowing them to maintain tariff walls against our goods for the benefit of their own manufacturers. This, so far as I can make it out, is the latest plan of campaign between these two worthies.

It is by no means so easy a task to give representative government to Russia as some seem to suppose. The vast Empire contains many races that are hardly civilised, and the Czar is the only tie that binds them together. Nor is this the only difficulty. In Russia that middle class which is the ballast in representative government is non-existent. There are large merchants and manufacturers, but politically there are no shopkeepers. The artisan class seldom troubles itself with politics, provided that its Artels are not interfered with. The mass of the population lives on the land. The nobility own the soil, and are what we should call country gentlemen. The village pays a rent to the owner and the taxes to the Government. The villagers portion out the land between themselves. There is no legal fixity of tenure, but the villager retains his plot by usage, provided that he cultivates it. In each province there is a Local Council, which is elected by the landowners, and on which practically landowners alone sit. The Council has the right to petition the Czar directly if it has to complain of the Minister of the Interior or of his local representatives, and this right it occasionally exercises.

In the main, the Councils act fairly to the peasants. There is, however, a certain amount of friction between the two, and the peasants have generally a superstitious respect for the Csar, whom they believe to be their protection against injustice on the part of the country gentlemen. At one word from him they would rise against the latter and burn their houses. The beauracracy is ill paid, and is thoroughly corrupt. So are the lower law courts. Both in towns and in country districts there are Anarchists and Nihilists. These are, however, comparatively few in number. They meet together secretly, have passwords, know how to keep their secrets, and their main idea of promoting the cause of reform is to blow up somebody or something. Up to a point many are in sympathy with them, because they are, in a general way, discontented with their lot; but I doubt whether many approve of their methods, or are hostile to the Czar. When there are riots, they are generally due to some local grievance.

All hate the Jews, not on account of their religion, but because they insist upon living apart from the rest of the community, and are given to usury. They are to Russia what the gombeen men are to Ireland. Russians of all classes have many excellent qualities. But they are more or less Orientals, too dreamy to be practical, apt to rush into extremes at one moment and to be lethargic and indifferent to everything at another. They have no sustained energy, either for good or bad.

With such elements it seems to me to be necessary not to make a sudden plunge from an Oriental autocracy into a free representative government. Such a plunge might lead to anarchy and to a return eventually to despotism. The Emperor should commence by giving more liberty of action to provincial Councils and to municipalities, and by introducing a popular element into both. These Councils and the great municipalities might send delegates to a General Council at St. Petersburg, and this general council might by degrees be expanded into a Parliament. If the present Emperor were as able and experienced as he is well intentioned, he might retain a good deal of control during the process of building up a representative scheme of rule. As he is not, he should act through a Council of State, composed of men honestly desirous of free institutions and with some experience of governing.

It has taken us millions on millions of years to develop into what we are from protoplasmic mud, and, looking to the future, twenty years would not be too much to convert Russia into a self-governing country. Such a period is nothing in the life of a nation. I abominate autocracies. I am for the rule of the people by the people in Russia as elsewhere. But I would risk nothing by too much haste. I would grind my corn before I tried to make my loaf. There is nothing easier than to draw up a cut-and-dried Constitution, perfect on paper. The Empress Catherine invited the philosopher D'Alembert to visit her, and begged him to draw up a Constitution for her Empire. The sage cheerfully accepted the task, but when that astute, but disreputable, female read his Constitution, she ridiculed it, for it assumed that Russia was inhabited by French philosophers, and nothing more was heard of the Constitution. Bad as her government in many respects was, Russia would probably have prospered less under the theories of this sage.

The war correspondents tell terrible tales of the effect of the hand grenades used by Russians and Japanese in their hand-to-hand struggles, and some of them suggest that they are more harmful than the dum-dum bullets, forbidden at present by the International War Code. I fail to see the distinction between a shell and an explosive bullet, nor do I understand why, in a life-and-death struggle, any mode of taking life should be forbidden. If it be said that a bullet that only temporarily wounds ought to be preferred to one that kills, I disagree with this view, for in a war of considerable duration the object is not only to disable temporarily, but to reduce the number of available combatants of the enemy. Moreover, the fact of knowing in an assault or in the defence of a position that a wound will probably cause death must have a certain moral effect on the combatants, which may lead to their retreating.

In the fifteenth century bands of mercenary soldiers used to hire themselves out to the highest bidder. With them war was a trade, and as they did not wish to render it dangerous, there were rules which protected them from many of its risks. The result was that States were always fighting, and in one great battle it is recounted that the only person killed on either side was smothered by the weight of his armour. I hold that the more destructive to life and property war is made, the less probability is there that people will be dragged into wars by "statesmen" and by the Bobadils of the Press, who are always stirring up strife without themselves having any intention to risk their skins. Nothing would conduce more to peace than the certainty that a battle would result in the death of almost all the combatants.

I respect bravery. A soldier who runs away is a contemptible creature. In the present state of the world armies are a necessity. But I cannot say that I have any exceptional respect for men who become soldiers from a love of adventure and from the pleasure of fighting. There is nothing noble in the desire to kill one's fellow-creatures, regardless of any cause of quarrel with them. The citizen who loves peace, and who yet is prepared to risk his life in defence of his country, stands on a far higher plane. Bravery under arms is almost universal, though some races possess it in a higher degree than others. After a soldier has been once or twice under fire, he is seldom afraid of it. He acquires a sort of fatalistic belief that he will not be injured—or, perhaps it would be more correct to say, that he does not think whether he will be or not.

SCRUTATOR.

A NEW BRITISH CONSTITUTION.

WERE I invested with full powers to amend our present scheme of representative government, I should begin with the following reforms:—

1. The human body is renewed every few years, but it remains the same body. So it should be with the British Parliament, except that, whereas the body eventually disappears, the House of Commons should ever exist. This might be effected by each member of the House of Commons being elected for three years, and an election of one-third of the members being held every year. Thus the House of Commons would never die, or be recreated, and yet it would as a rule represent the well-considered opinion of the country, whilst if a Ministry in any year showed an abnormal incapacity, or deliberately ran counter to the views of the electorate, there would be an opportunity to get rid of it. These annual elections, coupled with by-elections, would keep the People's House in perpetual touch with the People. A House thus constituted would prove a better legislating and controlling Council than that which we have now. A new Parliament generally takes a year to shake itself into shape. The chance of sudden extinction always hangs over it. On one side there is the desire to slay it, on the other to keep it alive. It often happens that the Ministry in office has lost the confidence of the country, and even of its own supporters. In such cases all is reduced to stagnation. Its supporters only vote with it on condition that it does nothing, and because they wish to put off as long as possible a General Election. The less a House of Commons is in harmony with the country, the stronger is the effort to put off consulting it. The minority is always asserting that the country has altered its views since the last General Election, whether it be so or not. The majority replies by a denial, although it may know that it is so. As a Ministry may choose the time for an election, frequently one is delayed or rushed to catch some temporary gust of popular favour. My plan is, of course, open to objections. But such is the case with all political institutions, and always will be until the millennium. What I claim for it is that it would make Parliament far more than at present the mirror of well-considered public opinion; that it would strengthen popular control; and that this control would be perpetually exercised, and not, as now, spasmodically. It is almost unnecessary to add that during the first three years of this never-dying Parliament certain temporary arrangements would be necessary. In the election of the first new House of Commons all the constituencies would be polled at the same time. So soon as elected a Committee would have to divide the constituencies into three categories, each category representing the views of the entire country collectively, and, so far as possible, all parts of it. A ballot would have to decide which category of members should sit for one year, which for two, and which for three. After this the categories would remain unchanged, and each elected member would sit automatically for three years.

2. The House of Lords would cease to exist. It would be replaced by a Senate thus constituted: Every person who had sat for twenty years in the House of Commons would be entitled to become a Senator. But if he did so, he could never again occupy any other post in the service of the country, nor receive any public mark of distinction. Thus we should have a body of independent men, in whom the constituencies had already several times signified their confidence. The House of Commons should, in addition, elect as Senators three ex-judges, three financial experts, three manufacturers, three wholesale merchants, three retail traders, three admirals, three generals, three literary men, three architects or painters, and twelve artisans. The term of office would be three years, and each year one-third of each category would be renewed by election. The functions of this Senate would be limited to discussion of all public matters, and to passing resolutions (quantum valeant) thereon, and to the right of a suspensory veto on Bills sent up by the House of Commons. All Bills would originate in the House of Commons. If the Senate passed them, when sent up to it, without modifications, they would become law. If thrown out by the Senate, or if altered, provided the House of Commons declined to agree to the alterations, the Bills could not be reintroduced that Session. But in this case they might be again brought into the House of Commons after the next annual election. If passed by an "aye" or "no" vote without discussion, they would become law on the Royal assent being given.

3. There would be a manhood Parliamentary franchise, subject to a three months' term of residence in a constituency. But if any person during these three months had bonâ-fide changed his abode, his vote might be transferred to this other constituency, provided that he had not exercised it in either of the two previous annual elections, and that proper notice of removal had been given to the registration authorities.

4. All costs incident to registration, and all necessary costs incident to an election, would be defrayed from public funds.

5. There are at present 670 M.P.s. Half could do better work. I should therefore reduce the number to 335.

6. A redistribution of seats would be necessary. It would be based upon the equality of electors in each constituency, but this rule would not be absolute, for other circumstances would be taken into consideration.

7. The date of the annual election would be the same each year. All elections would be held on that day. If any one candidate did not poll a majority over all others combined, there would be a second election that day week, when the two who were at the head of the poll would be the only candidates.

8. All M.P.s and all members of the Senate would receive £250 per annum, and in the case of the former an allowance would be added for travelling expenses, based upon the distance between the Metropolis and the constituency that each represented.

9. Not more than twenty members of the House of Commons should be allowed to occupy paid posts in an Administration, and in no case should any one of them receive more than £500 per annum, with the exception of the Premier and the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, who might be given an additional allowance to cover the cost of official entertainments. Such a reform as this is needed. At present the number of M.P.s who receive huge salaries so long as their Party is in office is a serious danger to the independence of the House. Politics should not be a profession. The only ground for giving M.P.s a salary is that poor as well as rich men should be able to sit in the House. But the amount should be small. If £500 per annum be added to a member's salary for any additional costs incident to being a Minister, this is quite enough. I hear it sometimes said that members of an Administration have to maintain the dignity of that position. Provided that they have enough decently to maintain themselves and their families, no one asks for more. No one cares whether they live in a big house or a small one, drive in a carriage or in a cab, or have a footman instead of a parlour maid. If people want to make money they should take to money-making. No member can be worth his salt if the amount of the salt is a consideration to him.

10. If there be one thing that has been more clearly proved by experience than another, it is that the House of Commons has at present more work thrown on it than it can properly perform. Rules have been made which, though professedly aimed at obstruction, render it impossible either adequately to discuss Bills of great importance during their Committee stage, or to bring before the House, without the permission of the Government, questions that, although perhaps not quite ripe for solution, might with public advantage be debated in the Great Council of the nation. The plan of delegating Bills to what are called Grand Committees has not proved successful when the Bill is of a controversial character and involves issues on which party differences prevail. We ought, therefore, frankly to recognise that "Home Rule all round" is the only true solution. The United Kingdom consists of four kingdoms—or, to speak more exactly, three kingdoms and a principality—each having its own nationality, and whose inhabitants view domestic matters often differently. We ought to have one Imperial Parliament and four local Parliaments. In regard to the proper division of power, we should do well to take the constitution of the United States as our model. The line there between the powers of a State Legislature and of the Federal Legislature are clearly laid down, and if there be a difference as to interpretation, a high judicial tribunal decides. What the objection to our adopting this system may be, I never have understood. It works exceedingly well in the United States. Why should it not work equally well with us? It certainly cannot work worse than our system. The Imperial Parliament cannot do the work thrown upon it. Every year the complaints are louder. I know of no other remedy for this except relieving it of some of its work.

There are very few of these reforms to which the entire rank and file of the Liberal Party would not assent; indeed, they have declared that they are in favour of most of them again and again. They recognise that they would be in the public interest, and they have the sense to see that reforms, and especially Liberal reforms, are hopeless, so long as the legislative machine does not suffice for the work thrown on it. Why, then, for the moment is little said about them? In part, because of our leaders, and in part because of the rank and file. The leaders prefer to seek to obtain place by reviling their opponents and by professing that they will carry some one particular reform—generally the one for which the shouting is loudest. So soon as they do get into office, they look to the line of least resistance to their retaining office. They find the Party label more useful than the Party principles. The Radicalism of our Leaders is only skin-deep, and many of them are Liberals by accident and Conservatives by temperament. The very last thing that they desire is that any real democratic progress should be made. The rank and file of the Liberal Party has vague aspirations on most matters, whilst each section of them has its own grievance that it would have removed. This militates against their subordinating particular reforms to a reform of the machinery of legislation, and it is very difficult to induce them to take a large, broad view of the situation. They are satisfied with some immediate dividend, like shareholders in a public company, without troubling themselves whether capital be safe and future dividends assured. If the advanced Radicals would only act together, they could enforce their will on a Liberal Ministry, for most of its supporters are advanced Radicals. Democrats should have the sense to act together in matters on which they are all agreed, and when they have carried these, it will be time enough for them to fall out. One would suppose that all of them would have the sense to see that until the legislature is democratised it is as vain to expect democratic legislation as figs from thorn bushes. The Conservatives used to be called the stupid Party. Of late they have fully justified this definition of them. Leaders and followers seem to have lost their heads. They only have to see a precipice before them to rush over it like the Gadarene swine possessed by demons. But if some impartial judge were asked to decide between the relative stupidity of Democrats and Conservatives, he would have some doubts as to his decision. Generally speaking, in all connected with securing a majority, the Conservatives are a good deal more intelligent than the Democrats. The former have the smaller force, but it is (except when, as now, some Chamberlain gets the upper hand in the Conservative counsels) far better organised, and far more homogeneous, than the army of democracy. Win we sometimes do. But we gain but little by our victory. We pull down what our opponents have built up. But when we come to constructive policy, we fall to pieces, and if we do manage to carry a reform, we let the Lords emasculate it.

BANK CLERKS AND BLOODSUCKERS.

There are several different species of the sharks of usury. Some prey indiscriminately upon all sorts and conditions of people, others devote themselves to the pursuit of a particular class. I know of West-End sharks whose victims are drawn almost exclusively from the ranks of gilded youth. Their touts are ever on the look-out for the prodigal son and spendthrift heir. Others of the tribe deal mainly with professional and business men. One extortioner whom I have frequently pilloried has for years past concentrated his attention upon the medical profession and another marks down the beneficed clergy for his own. Then there are those who pose as the friends in need of the struggling tradesman, the distressed agriculturist, and even the impecunious artisan—in fact, every section of the community seems to attract some specialists in usury, besides being a hunting-ground for the general practitioners. Of all these vampires the vilest, I think, are those who batten upon the class typified by the bank clerk. From time to time during the past ten years, I have referred to individuals and firms in the City who make a specialty of this business. Some interesting evidence on the subject was given before the Select Committee on Moneylending in 1897 and light is thrown upon it occasionally by actions in the City of London Court. I doubt, however, whether the directors of banking companies and other employers, let alone the public at large, have any conception of the wholesale way in which this sort of bloodsucking is carried on.

The average bank clerkship is so lean and ill-fed a berth that at first sight it may seem strange that any usurer should deem the clerk worth his attention. The lot of the bank clerk is, indeed, one of life's ironies. Banking is the pivot on which the trade and commerce of the country turn, and itself the most stable and prosperous of businesses. No self-respecting banking company pays less than a steady 10 per cent. dividend. In the popular imagination the bank clerk doubtless gains a reflected glory from the wealth with which he is surrounded. He is pictured shovelling up heaps of gold and handling bundles of notes, and on the principle that he who drives fat oxen should himself be fat, it might be supposed that such an occupation would be well paid. The truth is, of course, that it is the reverse of well paid. The banker's clerk is as the muzzled ox which treadeth out the corn. The youth fresh from school, just entering a bank, is, perhaps, passing rich on £40 a year. The start is not so bad, but progress afterwards is painfully slow. There are exceptions, but in most of the joint-stock banks it takes a clerk a long time to reach a salary of £100 a year, and it is often twenty years before he is getting as much as £3 a week. Very likely he has a wife and children, and the family must live, or make a show of living, in the style considered necessary for the social class to which they belong. In London many a mechanic has as big a wage as the average bank clerk, and he is infinitely better off, for the reason that he and his family have not to keep up the same appearances. It may be said that the bank clerk should cut his coat according to his cloth, but sentiment is stronger than reason in these matters, and it is as absurd to expect the bank clerk to live in the manner of the working man as it would be to ask the working man to wear a frockcoat and silk hat when he goes to his daily toil. On previous occasions when I have expressed the opinion that bank clerks as a body are disgracefully underpaid I have been met with the reply that the bankers never have any difficulty in getting plenty of men at the price, but on the contrary are overwhelmed with applications for every vacancy. I daresay this is so, but the East End sweater uses very much the same argument, and it is not regarded as a justification of his sweating. Whatever their employers may say, however, it is a well-known fact that no class of men have a harder struggle to make both ends meet than bank clerks, and when a difficulty arises they are as prone as others to succumb to the temptation of an offer of "cash accommodation" without pausing to consider the price that will have to be paid for it. The temptation is all the greater in their case because the usurer is so ready to accept a promissory note without further security or sureties. In practically every bank from the Bank of England downwards a clerk is liable to instant dismissal if he is found to have been borrowing from a professional moneylender or backing a bill for a friend. The rule is as good a security as the bloodsucker needs. He knows that the clerk who has fallen into his clutches will submit to any extortion and make any sacrifice rather than run the risk of losing his situation through the disclosure of the transaction which is threatened the moment he gets behind with his payments. By means of what is virtually a system of blackmailing the usurer reduces his risk of loss to a minimum, and on a comparatively small capital he makes an enormous profit. Nor is this system confined to clerks in banks, those in some of the large insurance companies' offices and in various branches of the public service being similarly squeezed.

At the present time the most active of the harpies engaged in this nefarious business are two brothers named William Herbert Whiteman and Arthur George Whiteman, trading at 32, Walbrook, E.C., as Seymour and Whiteman. On several occasions, examples of their extortion and their blackmailing have been given in Truth. In one case a bank clerk, who was being charged 160 per cent. on a small loan, was compelled, under a threat of exposure to his employers, to sign a fresh bill increasing the interest to 300 per cent. Another clerk, in the service of the London County Council, obtained a loan of £7 10s., and in twelve months paid back £13 14s. 6d. This still left him indebted to these unconscionable usurers, and he was then told that if he did not give a fresh bill for £15 the Chairman of the Council would be informed of the transaction. William Henry Burgess, who uses the registered alias of "Richards and Co.," 39, Lombard-street, is another of the usurers doing business with clerks and others in permanent positions—indeed, he issues a special circular offering such persons what he calls "advances in anticipation of salaries." An accountant in the City assured me the other day that there is scarcely a bank or large office in London which does not yield its quota of victims to the rapacity of the Whitemans, Burgess, and other rascals of the same kidney. No doubt some of the borrowers are only paying the penalty for their own folly and extravagance, but there are many more whose position is due to sheer misfortune. Through an expensive illness or some such unavoidable cause they have fallen into the toils of the moneylender, and once enmeshed have found it impossible to extricate themselves. A notable case of the kind came before the City of London Court a year or so back, when it appeared that a borrower of £20 from Burgess had paid £3 a quarter for interest until his payments amounted to £60, but was still indebted for the principal. The accountant referred to above suggested that if bank directors and other employers were aware of the extent of this evil they would perhaps do something to abate it. The obvious remedy for much of this borrowing by clerks would be to pay the borrowers a better wage. Failing this, however, a sort of amnesty might surely be granted to those clerks who are already in the clutches of Shylock. There are hundreds of cases of "harsh and unconscionable" usury in which relief could be obtained from a court of law if the victims were not under fear of dismissal. The rule on the subject, in fact, does nothing to stop borrowing by clerks, but simply places them at the mercy of unscrupulous lenders. It is really, therefore, a mischievous rule, and might well be abolished.

A LAST CHANCE FOR THE RICH.

At this season of the year many appeals are addressed, as I mentioned only last week, to those who have this world's goods. As a rule, the object of these appeals is to get a portion of those goods out of the possession of the present holders. Far different is the aim of a series of appeals that I have had lying before me for the last few weeks, awaiting a suitable notice, for which I have not yet been able to find an opportunity. The noble object of the appellant in this case is to help the rich man to keep his riches, to warn him of the dangers that threaten him on every side, to show him the simple safeguard which will insure him against destruction. The reader will perhaps have guessed already the name of the rich man's friend. It is the Rev. George Brooks again. Neglect, indifference, misfortune, poverty—for I regret to say that the financial crisis is again acute—are powerless to daunt this devoted man. He will save the rich in spite of themselves. With that object the type-writer has been again at work, and whole batches of stirring declamation were posted to the more improvident of our rich men in the course of November. There seems also to have been an appeal in August, prompted by that significant event, the murder of M. de Plehve, and the old stock was used again in the later edition of the appeal. Listen to the opening passage:—

Sir,—The murder of M. de Plehve, the latest fruit of Socialism, shows that the danger from that source is as great as ever, and that such work as I have been doing for ten years past is more needed than ever. In two articles in the Fortnightly Review I have dealt very fully with the nature and effects of Socialism and Anarchism.

By doing this sort of work, work in the interests of British property-owners, employers, Irish landlords, etc.—which is really work in the interests of the whole community—I have beggared myself. Perhaps I was a fool to do it. But surely it is a virtuous folly!

There is something fine, I think, in this half-contemptuous self-depreciation, instantly qualified by the proud self-assertion of conscious virtue. "Call me fool," he says, "if you will; but not knave, I implore you." In this cynical age, how many would prefer to have it the other way about!

After this impressive exordium, we come at once to business:—

I may have sent you a copy of my latest work—The Shadow of England's Doom, and also a copy of my latest pamphlet—The Return to Sanity. I enclose another copy of the latter Earl Egerton and Sir William Lewis each took 1,000 copies at £10. Will you do likewise? This would help me greatly.

And help you also, of course, at the same time. The first stage of the argument has been disclosed in the previous paragraph, and this clinches it. George Brooks is working in the interests of the British property owners, employers, and Irish landlords. These interests are identical with "the interests of the whole community." By taking 1,000 copies of England's Doom at £10 you will greatly help the work of George Brooks. Ergo, your £10 will go direct to the property-owners, the employers, the Irish landlords, and the whole community. Nothing could be simpler.

I am about to move into a cheaper house. . . . .

Oh, the pathos of it! For ten years or more, the world has known this gifted man, and all that time he has been on the move. Too frequently the removal has been aggravated by a sale. Always it has marked another stage in the downward path. Did anybody ever hear that George Brooks was about to move into a more expensive house? Not I, at any rate, and I think I have the record by me of nearly all these flittings. One of the makers of our proverbs has told us that two moves are worse than a fire. Yet here we have this devoted man, labouring only for the benefit of those who have more money than they know what to do with, hurling his household gods into the pantechnicon van, not twice, but a dozen times in as many years. And the pity of it is that there has not been a single occasion when a £10 note invested in Industry and Property or England's Doom, would not have averted the domestic calamity. Think of that, property-owners and others, whose ingratitude, not to say stinginess, involves every few months a fresh dislocation of the Brooks household. I ask pardon for this digression. Let us resume:—

I am about to move into a cheaper house, and I have important new literary work on hand. If I could sell some books now it would be a godsend. I have £200 worth of the 3s. 6d. edition of Industry and Property on hand. Will you take 100 of these for £10? This work is pronounced by Sir Theodore Martin, Sir Gabriel Stokes, and others, to be . . . .

But my readers know what Sir Theodore Martin and the other critics think of Industry and Property. I pass therefore to the concluding passage:—

May I request an early response to this letter, as things are most pressing and urgent with me? The response I should best like would be £20 for 1,000 copies of the pamphlet and 100 copies of the book. But far be it from me to dictate, or even suggest how you should help. For assistance in any form or measure I shall be sincerely grateful, as I am for all past sympathy and aid.—I beg to remain, Sir, Your obedient servant,

George Brooks.

As I have already said, this appeal was originally penned in August, but it was being sent out again in November. One is forced to the painful conclusion that the response Brooks would have liked best—a mere matter of £20—was not forthcoming. Three months have elapsed, and the situation has not altered. The rich man's friend is still about to move into a new house. The £200 worth of Industry and Property is still on hand. A £20 order is still what the author would like best, but in his pathetic meekness he is still far from presuming to dictate his own terms, still ready to leave it to you. Where, I would ask, has the rich man been all this time? Maybe at Cowes, or Homburg, or in Scotland, living his empty life without a thought of England's Doom, or the humble benefactor bravely struggling to avert it. It is a tragic picture, and shows human nature in an ugly light.

But does it dishearten Mr. Brooks? Not a bit of it. At the end of the three months he is at the rich man again, not to be denied. The appeal is reinforced by a red leaflet, containing the latest sympathetic messages of Sir Theodore Martin and the Marquis of Bristol. Let it be remembered, to their credit, that these two good and wise men, almost alone among their class, have never failed in their perception of the dangers hanging over them and their duty to the rich man's friend. Even when they are not taking any more copies of Industry and Property, they are always ready with a testimonial, and, as for Sir Theodore Martin, he must have laid in a sufficient store of Brooks's works to stock all the Carnegie libraries. Together with their sympathetic utterances the rich man is favoured with another tract of a more drastic nature, entitled "Can Ye not Discern the Signs of the Times?" It gives a terrible picture of the parlous plight of the propertied class, and the weak-kneed attitude of those who should be its defenders:—

A third article on Socialism and Murder has just been returned to me by a magazine editor—a Conservative, forsooth!—with the remark that the assassination of M. de Plehve could not "reasonably be attributed to Socialism, but was an inevitable fruit of absolutism." That is to say, because Russia has not yet got Constitutional government (which, by the way, they would have had years ago but for the Socialists), therefore the murder of Russian Ministers is inevitable, therefore necessary, therefore natural, therefore not to be condemned.

My Conservative contemporary little thought what he was saying when he penned that unfortunate sentence. It is only when a George Brooks turns his luminous intellect on to the words—like an acute pleader dissecting an alleged libel with his remorseless "meaning thereby"—that we see what the ruffian really had in his mind all the time. Having got his wretched meaning out of him, Mr. Brooks has no difficulty in showing its lurid significance:—

This spirit is a far graver symptom than the thirty assassinations which have taken place during the last century.

It is the spirit which sought to justify the shooting of Irish landlords.

It is the spirit which singles out rich men as targets of envy, malice, and hatred.

The other day a crowd of labourers, armed with scythes, forks, etc., surrounded the castle of a Hungarian Count, and demanded that he should divide his estate among them equally!

Yes; but that was in Hungary!

Well, the other day, also, a crowd of loafers were invited to make a raid on the Leeds Town Hall, and an organised movement against Capital is on foot in that town. "Why should any one else have anything while we have nothing?" these fools ask. And then the Knaves add: "Why shouldn't we take by force what anybody else has?" It's only a repetition in a mild form of what has been done in London.

WHEN WILL OUR RICH MEN DISCERN THE SIGNS OF THE TIMES?

G. B.

Yes; that is evidently the question. It may be that ere this it has been satisfactorily answered, that a rich man has been found who, discerning the signs of the times, has given the response that Brooks would like best—£20 for 1,000 copies of the pamphlet and 100 copies of the book—or, failing that, has given assistance in some other "form or measure." There comes a time when even the closest of rich men can hold out no longer against unremitting, indomitable cadging. But if it is not so, I humbly suggest to Mr. Brooks that the time has come to give up the game. Why, even Sir Theodore Martin says "You have too long for your own good pursued the thankless task of trying to stem the tide of Socialism," meaning, of course, "too long for your own good"—not that Brooks has been pursuing the task for his own good. The fact is that our rich men are hopeless. The best proof I can give of that is that every time a fresh batch of these appeals goes out, a considerable percentage of them is promptly forwarded on to TRUTH Office. There is only one inference from that, and it is that our rich men do not want to be saved—at any rate, by George Brooks. It may be that they do not believe in ENGLAND'S DOOM, or, it may be, that they grudge the investment of a paltry £5 or £10 in copies of Industry and Property. But, either way, the result is the same. It is no use arguing with them. Quem Deus vult perdere. . . . Brooks has done all that a man can, more than ninety-nine out of a hundred would have the—let us call it perseverance to do. I recommend him to sell the typewriter, buy a spade or a pick-axe, or some useful implement, and let things take their course. I admit that I may not appear disinterested in this matter. It is my blessed privilege to be numbered among the creditors of the Brooks' estate, and if the rich men would only discern the signs of the times in a liberal spirit, something in the pound might possibly come my way. But I am not thinking about that. So far as I am concerned, my little debt is "not expected to rank." All such expectations have vanished long ago. And I do not want Sir Theodore Martin's money, nor my Lord Bristol's either; neither have I any expectations from Sir William Lewis. I am moved merely by human sympathy for poor George Brooks, ploughing his lonely furrow so heroically, and raising such a pitiful crop. The soil may look rich, but it is not worth the labour. I should really like to see Brooks doing something useful in the world, with all his talents, and that is why I recommend him to begin at once.

THE THEATRES.

"LITTLE BLACK SAMBO AND LITTLE WHITE BARBARA," AT THE GARRICK.

The Garrick matinées for children are now in full swing, and one may truthfully say that there is nothing in them which can appeal to the bloated grown-ups. They are infantine, and may thus be held to have secured their purpose. Far be it from me to say that "Lady Jane's Christmas Party," the "old-fashioned episode" which precedes the medley in black and white, is not a masterpiece of its kind. Yet I must candidly admit that the sitting out of both plays irked me considerably. Lover as I am of "Alice in Wonderland" and of such works as "The Golden Age," I suppose that what one felt the want of was that touch of poetic imagination which makes the sixty and the six-year-old kin.

The psychology of children is a difficult subject, and my own boredom at these plays recalls to me an episode which I read lately in some learned work, where a professor was at much pains to prove, against the present fashion, the inveterate stupidity of children. It was a question of building sand castles, and the professor described how he had frequented the sea-shore where some children of his acquaintance were in the habit of erecting their crumbling edifices. The professor watched them for some time, and then interposed with his maturer wisdom. Having pointed out that they were building them all wrong, and that they could not withstand the onslaught of the lightest wave as they then stood, he proceeded to reconstruct the crumbling castles upon a more scientific plan. He made a beautiful moat first, and then proceeded to lay firm foundations, and was just proceeding to erect the fortified parapet round the first castle, when he looked up from his engrossing work to find that the children had slipped away and were in the act of constructing a new set of castles in their old wrong way a few yards off. Poor professor!

Well, I suppose I must write myself down in agreement with that guileless professor as regards this entertainment, but I am perfectly ready to admit that Mr. Tom Gallon and Mr. Rutland Barrington, the adapter of the "Dumpy Books," from which Mr. Wilfrid Bendall and Mr. Frederick Rosse have extracted the music of this medley in black and white, are quite right. I dare say childish hearts will throb and childish palms will meet over the little adventure of (Lady) Jane and Charlie. It is fun, no doubt, to entertain clowns unaware, and I am sure it is much more fun than the entertainment of angels.

Miss Nellie Bowman played the part of Jane in the first, of Little Black Sambo in the second, part with verve and the skill that comes from experience. In the latter play there is a dear little white heroine, to amuse whom we are taken to Black Jumbo's cabin at the edge of the jungle. Her white name is Little Barbara, and her right name is Iris Hawkins. Then there is sweet Miss Madge Titheradge, who is disguised as Liza the Quadroon. She sings to us, she trips a measure, delightfully. Pompey, too, is a personage. He whistles and cake-walks and coon-sings, and, in fact, is in himself a variety entertainment. Miss Nellie Bowman is also active and excellent, as I have said, in what she has to do. As to Plantagenet the black, Mammy Mumbo, and a congeries of dusky atoms who start, one by one, into restless activity, I think that, as this journal is perused less in the nursery than elsewhere, it will be kindness to my readers, fathers of families, if I do not dilate upon their merits. They will have more than ample time to do so themselves when, at the clarionet call of duty, they sit through the performance with their ecstatic progeny.

The opening of the Scala Theatre last week was an interesting event, both as an actuality and as a revival of semi-historic memories. The latter associations were all with the Bancrofts, and Lady Bancroft gave to them an emotional reality which brought them up to the present. In her little speech she reminded her hearers of the first opening of the old Prince of Wales's Theatre, of her nailing up of the last lace curtain before the curtain rose on the first night, of the dolorous prophecies of her friends as to the improbability of the West End coming so far afield, of her triumphant proof that their prophecies were wrong, and of several other touching little incidents concerning bygone days. Not the least of these was the naming of those who had trodden its boards, so many of whom have ceased to tread the solid globe of earth.

A large number of theatrical, literary, and journalistic celebrities thronged the house or stood on the stage, from which the best view of the whole was obtainable. The proprietor, Mr. Distin Maddick, has been well served by his architect, Mr. Verity, who has erected for him a very handsome building. The main variation from the usual plan is the spacious marble staircase, from which the theatre takes its name of the Scala. Next to that come the boxes, which are limited to two, but these two in their aristocratic splendour give a dignity to that symbol of the democracy which are the serried seats of the playhouse. Some one remarked that the fitting occupants of the two boxes would be the King in full robes in the one, who should occasionally bow to the Pope in complete Apostolicals in the other. The other places seem well arranged; ingress and egress is everywhere easy. The stalls are on the same model as those of the New Gaiety, but felt rather less roomy than those.

A theatre with so great a past behind it should also (in the words of Heine) have a great past before it.

The Royal Italian Circus (Hengler's) has opened with a performance by a troupe of Cingalese dancers, and an interesting show revealing the native pastimes of Ceylon. The success of the initial performances has been such as to encourage the management to give three full performances daily.

The Mermaid Society is producing "The Knight of the Burning Pestle" for four weeks. Mrs. Theodore Wright, whose excellent performance as the citizen's wife I have here had occasion to praise, will play that part. For a like period in the afternoon will be given the children's fairy play, "Snowdrop and the Seven Little Men," preceded now by an adaptation from another of Grimm's fairy stories entitled "Rumpelstiltzkin."

Mr. Robert Arthur sends me a long list of pantomimes under his management to be produced on Christmas Eve at the Kennington, Coronet, Camden, and Fulham Theatres. They are, in the order of the theatres, "Aladdin," "Red Riding Hood," "Robinson Crusoe," and "The Forty Thieves."

* * * * *

At the Palace Theatre there is a remarkable programme for Christmas. I notice several items of especial interest, and hope to test ere long the excellence of the vintage there.

In my notice of "Lady Madcap" last week I credited Colonel Newnham-Davis with the authorship of "the book" of that extremely amusing musical comedy. Colonel Newnham-Davis has written to point out that this was not correct. "Mr. Paul Rubens and I," he says, "are jointly responsible for the libretto. Mr. Rubens wrote all the music and the words of many of the songs."

NOTES FROM PARIS.

THE LATE DUCHESS ALEXANDRINE.

THE venerable Duchess Alexandrine of Saxe-Coburg narrowly missed being Empress of Russia. She had been marked out from infancy for the Czarewitch Alexander Nicholaievitch. The widow of Alexander I. obtained a promise from Nicholas to prefer her niece, the godchild of her departed husband, to any other Princess, if possible. This sentimental wish concurred with a general policy which led Nicholas to patronise the Vasas against the Bernadottes and to establish Russian influence at the Court of Carlsruhe. Alexandrine's mother, as a daughter of the dethroned King of Sweden, was persona grata to Nicholas. The Grand Duchy of Baden commanded the road from St. Petersburg to revolutionary Paris. Cupid, who so often plays pranks with professors of statecraft, upset the matrimonial scheme of Nicholas. The Czarewitch Alexander obeyed his father in setting out for Baden to make the acquaintance of his appointed fiancée. On the way, however, he halted at Darmstadt, and there, quite by chance, had a glimpse of the Princess Maximiliana, and fell violently in love with her on the spot. He felt it would be misery to marry any one else. The object of his passion was undoubtedly the daughter of the divorced Grand Duchess of Hesse-Darmstadt. But serious doubts had been expressed as to Grand Ducal paternity, and she had been brought up in neglect. If tyrannical in most respects, Nicholas yielded to the romantic current of his time in suffering his two eldest children to make love matches. Alexandrine of Baden found herself thrust aside to make way for the all-but-disowned daughter of the Grand Duke of Hesse-Darmstadt.

This misfortune coincided with Queen Victoria's marriage, which shed so much lustre on the House of Saxe-

Coburg. Alexandrine fell back on Ernest of Saxe-Coburg, her late Majesty's brother-in-law. He and she spent, in the summer of 1842, their honeymoon at Claremont and with King Leopold at Ostend. They took Paris on the way home. Quite a network of matrimonial alliances had drawn the Saxe-Coburg and Orléans families together. The newly-married pair found at the Tuileries Prince Philippe of Wurtemberg, son of Antoinetta of Saxe-Coburg, and nephew of the Duchess Dowager of Coburg, as son-in-law of the Citizen King. Victoire of Saxe-Coburg had entered the Royal Family as Duchess de Nemours. The Princess Clementine had made up her mind to accept Duke August of Coburg-Kohary. The Nestor of the Coburg family, Leopold of Belgium, had, as another son-in-law of Louis-Philippe, rooms at the Tuileries. These brilliant connections would have been some compensation to a German Princess for what she had lost. Still life at Saxe-Coburg must have been widely different from the grand career at St. Petersburg to which Duchess Alexandrine had looked forward. In high Russian society they imitate French manners, and courtiers pride themselves on a chivalrous attitude towards women. Russian ladies had equal rights with men long before they had been talked of in the Western World. In the eighteenth century no less than four Empresses reigned almost successively. The Empress Consort owed to custom the widest influence. The Empress Mother ranked with the Validé Sultana in standing almost above the Emperor. The despotic Nicholas I. did not feel ashamed of being a submissive husband. His wife, a skinny Prussian Princess, might tire out all the young aides-de-camp in the palace at waltzing. She made, in splendid State, trips to German watering-places, to Italy, to Sicily, and led as enjoyable a life as her health allowed.

The Czarewitch who married the Hesse-Darmstadt Princess followed for years the paternal example. He had only eyes for her until he came under the spell of Catherine Dolgourouky, the eldest of three sisters who supplanted each other in his favour. He bought for his wife a residence in a picturesque part of the Odenwald. She could go there every summer to rusticate among the friends of her youth. Family affection tempered Imperial grandeur. Saxe-Coburg lies at no great distance from the Odenwald. The brilliant and full life of the Empress Marie Feodorovna could not have sweetened the lot of Alexandrine. A feature of that lot was to be married to a restlessly vain and egotistical man. In no respect was he a bad man, but he practised masculine despotism according to the German way, allowing German bluntness to come out in his domestic relations. He had a mania for proving elaborately that he was right each time that his opinion clashed with his wife's. A fancy for this, that, or the other stage star never melted him into amiable gallantry. The Duchess had but little money to spend. As she had no children, her interests were sadly limited. The Duke rarely took the Duchess with him when he went on foreign tours and pleasure trips. The frequent disappointments his ambitions met with kept alive a hepatic affection. This made him uncompanionable. At one time of his life he had hoped to be offered the Imperial Crown. He thought his musical talents amounted to genius, and spent heavily in trying to force his countrymen to recognise in him a great composer. They preferred Wagner. These wounds of amour propre reacted on the Duchess. "Memoirs" that he wrote with the assistance of Professor Ottaker, of Jena, failed to meet with a good reception.

The Duchess had the good fortune to be much among her own people. Two of her sisters married Hohenlohe and Leiningen grandsons of the Duchess of Kent, and lived in middle Germany. She greatly lost touch with Baden after her brother married a Prussian Princess. She kept the connection with the Court of Russia through her sister, the Grand Duchess Michael, wife of the youngest son of Nicholas I. As a descendant of George II. of Great Britain she claimed to stand so far as blood went on as high a plane as Queen Victoria. This birthright she traced to Louisa of Great Britain, whose daughter, Magdalen of Denmark, married Gustavus III., and was mother of Gustavus IV., grandfather of the Duchess.

After Duke Ernest's death his widow contracted her dower establishment into the merest skeleton of a household. She resided at the Callenberg with her single Lady of Honour, Fräulein Roper, who had no title other than Von. The Court of the Grand Duchess Marie stood on another footing. It comprises a Grand Chamberlain and Chamberlain (M. de Vignau), an official secretary, Baron de Menghen, who is also attached to the Russian Legation at Darmstadt, a pope acting as chaplain, a secretary and a private secretary, a lady and a maid of honour, a physician, and a treasurer. The Duchess Marie learned at Tegern See of the illness of her venerable aunt-in-law, and hastened back to Coburg to stay near her. The Duchess Alexandrine died at the Callenberg, an ancient castle which Duke Ernest restored in the forties.

There could have been no doubt that the Conseil d'Administration of the Français Company would elect Mlle. Pierat a member. She comes in at an earlier age than any of her predecessors. Her age is given in the papers as nineteen on September 18 last. She is really a year older. Her mother, Mme. Alice Parrot, formerly of the Odéon, neglected to register the birth for twelve months, owing to the hurry of her theatrical and other engagements. The devotion of that comédienne to her daughter, her settled determination to make her a paragon, and the way she went about it remind one of the maternal care that Mme. Poisson bestowed on her daughter Antoinette, who had come down to us as Mme. de Pompadour. Mlle. Pierat's father left her £16,000, which Mme. Parrot carefully and advantageously invested. As she had herself become almost well off, she let interests accumulate, or, rather, so managed them as to make them to fructify on a compound scale. She gave every possible advantage to the future Princesse de la Rampe, attended with the most enlightened care to adornment of mind, health of body, to the development of artistic and intellectual capacities, and sunk herself as the girl grew up into a mère de théâtre. The success has been so extraordinary that one is reminded of those mediæval pacts with I must not say whom. Gymnastics, dancing, swimming baths, horseback exercise, entered into the beauty-cultural part of the programme. No course of training was to be pushed far enough to break down elasticity or quench natural gaiety. Temperance in all things was to be induced, and within the limits of theatrical freedom, self-respect, and a sense of honour. As all the arts are closely connected, Mlle. Pierat learned to paint as an artist, to draw, and to play pianoforte music at sight. The devoted parent took her to London to see the Rotten Row equestrians, and missed no opportunities to show her at the circus the stars of haute école performances. No day passed without its appointed tasks. The accretion of accomplishments became incredibly great ere it was time to enter the Conservatoire, for which Mme. Parrot herself, helped by Feraudy, prepared the young paragon. She had had the very best professors of literature, of diction, of foreign and ancient languages, and could play in a Greek or Latin tragedy or comedy.

Her appearance is that of a slim and finely formed blond, with a modernised and slightly saucy Greek head. The small mouth, a little pouting, but delicately so, emits with ease a sweet voice. The eyes, while often ingenuous, are always intelligent, and sometimes strike one as gaily and slyly watchful. But no expression is ever underscored, and effects are smooth and natural. The hair is of a lovely blond cendré shade. To find its match one must go back to the first Duchesse de Morny, née Sophie Troubetskoi. Mlle. Pierat might be a very charming American girl who never loses her head, has made up her mind as to a course of life, and is not to be turned from it. She will not be at the trouble of marrying unless some magnificent, and in all respects desirable, match offers. The world is before her, and under the most favourable circumstances. She likes liberty and hard work. She is ambitious, and her pecuniary means secure her against managerial despotism. Of almost aristocratic birth on one side, she flatters herself that she has native refinement. By her mother she comes of a stock that had to face the severest realities of life. She greatly distinguished herself in "L'Autre Danger" and "Notre Jeunesse." There are situations in the former which called for the most delicate tact. Otherwise they might have shocked and been thought unfit for the stage. In "Notre Jeunesse" she played the part of Lucienne with a ladylike grace and the sweet charm of youth, to which I strove in former notes to do justice. She left the Conservatoire with a first prize for comedy. I forgot to mention that she obtained a first-class teacher's brevet at the Hôtel de Ville. She is therefore qualified, should the humour take her, to take charge of an elementary school. I should like to see her in a comedy as "the New Woman." It would not surprise me if a little later she looked on marriage en philosophe, and just married from intellectual sympathy, and to clear away the thorns and briars from the path of some great soul and mind that she loved. I do not believe that a golden dream could satisfy her. The realisation of that dream, as in the case of Mlle. Croizette, and retirement from the stage, is the only reasonable course for a theatrical star of the first magnitude. She refuses to let her photo be paraded in the shop windows. I should fancy that her delicate features must be at a disadvantage on the best negatives.

The other newly-elected members of the Français are M. Henri Mayer, the born image of M. Jules Claretie, and M. Delaunay, son of the late perpetual walking gentleman of the same name. M. Mayer has a convex profile, and brows that rise high above the bridge of the nose and descend low at the temples. He has a fine voice, capable of a great variety of intonations. The facial peculiarity I speak of prevents him being at his best in profile. This is a pity. At the Français, more than any other theatre, the players show the side face. Delaunay keeps in his father's footsteps, is conscientious, gentlemanly, and knows how to interest lady spectators.

When the electoral business had been gone through, the Council betook themselves to that of raising salaries. Six Sociétaires obtained a twelfth of a share each, the share being this year 21,000 fr. To seven were given half a share. Besides their dividends, M. Berr and Mmes. Weber, Du Minil, Lecomte, Sorel, and Kolb received a twelfth part each, and MM. Truffier, Laugier (now a veteran player), Duflos, Dehelly, and Mmes. Muller and Lara half a share each. Mlle. Sorel is quoted high as a beauty, and makes all the hay she can while the sun shines. The unconcealed admiration of M. Félix Faure for her Marie Antoinette profile, under lip, and air placed her on a pedestal. She may be said to be hors du texte, not merely in the grand illustrated papers, but on the stage of the Français. The members who reaped this time full parts are Mounet-Sully, Coquelin cadet, or, as Thérésa calls him, Coq. II., Silvain, Paul Mounet, Le Bargy, De Feraudy, Leloir, Lambert. The ladies equally favoured are Mmes. Bartet, Dudlay, and Pierson. They only pocket 12,000 fr. apiece. The rest is paid into the retiring fund. It is now thought doing well to receive a share of 24,000 fr., less the deduction I have mentioned. Attendance to rehearse or play assures a fee of 10 fr. This gives over and above the augmentation about 1,500 fr. annually. Hirelings are not allowed this extra. Under Perrin the shares at the Français came so high that any first-class actor there was said to be as well paid as the President of the Chamber of Deputies. All this has changed since Sarah Bernhardt broke away. She now has a theatre of her own, which, so far, has been highly successful. So has Coquelin the elder; so had Réjane as long as she and her husband kept out of the divorce court. Le Bargy threatens to set up with his wife a playhouse in a new part of Paris. She has a wealthy mother, a fortune of her own, talent, and ambition, and she has now the habit of the scene. She is very clever, and at her best in intense parts, requiring auto-suggestion, sometimes up almost to the maddening point.

Réjane, who has been on a theatrical tour in the West Indies, and has visited the Mississippi cities and Chicago on her way home, finds that her stock of plays is not satisfactory. Havana is no longer the place it was under a Spanish Captain-General. She must now think of the susceptibility and respectability of the ladies who patronise the theatre. The Señores who have seen life in Paris are so particular about the subject of the play when they take wives and daughters to the playhouse. Réjane personally met with applause. But the plaudits were reserved for her entrances and exits. She appeared in nine pieces in all, and in eight as a heroine who, the audience thought, deserved to be locked up in a convent, or in Doctor Pierson's Lindenhof madhouse. The Press blamed her impresario for selecting immoral works, which had not the recommendation, excepting "Sapho" and "Tartuffe," of being written by masters of French style. Nearly every time the gifted actress came on the stage, she could not avoid calling blushes to young cheeks. To drown the dialogue mothers talked as if in their own drawing rooms. The répertoire embraced, besides the plays already mentioned, "Petite Marquise," "Zaza," "L'Hirondelle," "La Passerelle," "La Robe Rouge," which horrified those who well understood French, "La Douloureuse," "La Dame aux Camélias," which the public thought demoralising and, socially speaking, dangerous, "Amoureuse," and "Lolote."

They now want at Havana classical plays or plays with a high moral or social interest which tell a story and keep clear of thesis and psychological refinings and introspections that delay the action.

I see among the Christmas books of the season the Life of Joan of Arc by Monsignor Nordez, who does not call himself ex-Bishop of Dijon. The price in wrapper is 20 fr., and in shagreen binding 30 fr. We are not used here to prices so high. There are illustrations. I do not care for the author as a historian. He financed Joan of Arc splendidly when Suffragan of Verdun and Bishop of Dijon. I suppose this biography is the aftermath.

We expect a row, riot, noise, in the Chamber of Deputies about a circular of the Inspector-General of Elementary Instruction to the city schoolmasters. He ordered these teachers not to express views against Joan in schoolrooms. Some of them had addressed letters of sympathy to M. Thalamas. I think myself that the Maid of Orleans had been overdone. As I had been acquainted with her leading votaries, Henri Martin, Michelet, Wallon, and Fabre, I do not attach great historical importance to what they wrote about her. Michelet fell too utterly in love with every heroine he wrote about to preserve the critical faculty in dealing with her. Henri Martin had lost an only daughter, a painter of no ordinary talent, who left him a Joan of Arc in an ecstatic vision. It was simply nobly and naturally beautiful. Henri Martin had it before his eyes as he wrote of the reign of Charles VII. He persuaded himself that Joan was not a Catholic but a free-thought heroine, struggling against ecclesiastical authority for the leading of the spirit. She might have been as he saw her, a precursor of the father of Quakerism, George Fox. I never for a moment doubted of the good faith of Michelet or Henri Martin. Wallon, a pasty writer, had no insight nor divining power. Fabre—perfectly honest also—was an emotional, imaginative, idolatrous Southern. He adored Joan as he might, had he been a believing Catholic, have worshipped Mary Magdalen.

Il y a à boire et à manger is all we know of the rehabilitation of Joan d'Arc. She had to be rehabilitated for a political reason, and her mother brought in as intervenant. For a similar reason the prosecution of Blue Beard had been ordered for dealing in the black art and murdering infants. Historians now believe him to have been innocent of the latter crime. He treated that of sorcery with contempt, refused to defend himself, and asked as a last favour to be suffered as stage manager to arrange his own procession to the place of execution.

The ex-Queen of Portugal paid the President and Mme. Loubet the compliment of going to bid them good-bye at the Elysée. She also sent donations of money and toys to the Villepinte Hospital for Consumptive Children, which she visited last year. The Queen hopes soon to pass an examination for a medical degree. She is only an officer of health. Her resemblance to the late Comte de Paris becomes striking. When at the Hôtel Bristol she took care not to let her Royalist friends make use of her for political demonstrations, but went about with the Marquise d'Harcourt, and spent a day at the château of the Duchesse d'Uzès. The King did not go farther Right than to accept an invitation to shoot at Boisdrain from Comte de Greffuhle. While a Conservative, the Comte affects political scepticism. Through his daughter's marriage with the Duc de Guiche, he is connected with the Rothschilds. Someone at the shooting party who takes an interest in a coming water-colour exhibition asked Dom Carlos to exhibit there. He declined, giving the following as his reason: "Were I to exhibit as hors de concours it might appear fatuous. Not to do so would be worse. I should certainly, from motives of courtesy, be awarded some high prize. This would be an injustice to the professional artists. They ought to hate me for snatching, perhaps quite undeservedly, a reward from them. I am very fond of painting, or punting, yachting, singing, pour me distraire.

Carolus Duran, who never studied at the Villa Medici, has gone there as director. He is a rolling stone that has gathered moss, and can afford to live in a palace of his own in the Place de Iéna. In his roving early life he fell in love successively with the old Venetian masters and Velasquez, and assimilated both. It is said that he might have been a great portrait painter had he not devoted his best talents to the dressmaking side of his art. Yes, he is, above everything else, a costumier. I suppose this is because he is a son of Lille and of the same race as Froissart. The historical processions there are marvels of sumptuosity, and still worthy of being described by that old Flemish chronicler. One might look in vain for their match in any other European city. A rich Lillois thinks nothing of giving fifteen hundred pounds for the costume in which he is to figure in a cavalcade. One does not find a note that jars in the magnificent harmony of a Lille cortège. A parallel might be found in the robes and jewels of the late Mrs. Ayer as represented in a full-length portrait of that lady. This work is, of course, by Carolus Duran. Nobody else could have thrown so much brio into the painting of an uninspiring old lady ever solicitous to please by making up her face and neck. This artist could have been a great musical composer, a great actor, a great operatic singer, a dashing cavalry officer, and beaten in robes et manteaux every couturier in the Rue de la Paix. His wife is the only sister of the late Mme. Jacques Stern (Mlle. Croizette). Had the latter lived a few years longer, Mme. Carolus Duran would have come into the great Stern fortune, and taken a foremost place as a multi-millionaire. They are both hospitable, fond of society, rich, proud of their daughter's beauty, and of his rendering of it in a portrait taken as she entered her sixteenth year. That would have been in the eighties. I saw her soon after it appeared at the Salon at a fancy ball given by the late M. Cernuschi. She entered in a 'ricksha drawn by Carolus, wearing a Japanese costume, and with her hair dressed à la mode de Tokyo. A hum of admiration greeted her. She had something Asiatic in the contour and a soft, amiable slyness which one might expect to find in a mousmee. The Ecole de Rome will be under their direction a brilliant social centre.

THERE are to be more knights and mid-knights, dear Lady Betty, at the New Year! There are now winter knights, spring knights, summer knights, and autumn knights; long knights and short knights; light knights and dark knights; knights-on, that are frisky, and knights-off, that are crazy; and all of them imagine they are men of "light and leading"! They are; they are our knight-lights.

SPORTING NOTES.

TUESDAY next is one of the most important nomination days during the year. Entries will then have to be made for all the spring handicaps, and for a great number of very important weight-for-age events to be run during the next three seasons.

I am glad to see that a change which had been more than once recommended in Truth has at last been carried out in the conditions of the Gold Cup at Ascot. This event has been for some years past endowed with £3,000 of added money, and the winner also received a piece of plate value £1,000. It was suggested in Truth that it would be a popular change if the value of the piece of plate was reduced, the amount thus saved being added to the pecuniary endowment of the race. This year's Cup will be of the value of £500 only, and there is to be £3,500 of added money. The fact is that modern owners do not care for gorgeous and unwieldy pieces of plate, but much prefer more money, and a cup or salver of moderate value, which will serve as an adequate memento. It is a certain fact, moreover, that whenever a piece of racing plate has come into the market the amount realised has been far below the advertised value of the article. The winner of the Gold Cup will now receive £2,500 in money, besides the piece of plate, while the second horse gets £700, and £300 goes to the third. I dare say we shall find one at least of M. E. Blanc's three-year-olds entered for the Ascot Cup, which will be run on Thursday, June 22, eleven days after the race for the Grand Prix de Paris, so that next year there will be nothing to keep the best of the French horses away from Ascot.

The Coventry Stakes, which closes on Tuesday, has the same conditions as usual—£1,000 of added money, and a sweepstakes of £10 each. The All-aged Stakes would be a more successful race in all respects if the added money was increased from £300 to £600, and the endowment of the Windsor Castle Stakes (the only two-year-old race on the Friday) ought to be raised from £300 to £1,000. It is a pity that £1,500 should still be thrown away on the Alexandra Plate, which would be every bit as successful a race if it was endowed with only £1,000. It is very seldom that this event produces an interesting contest. The Alexandra Plate is either at the mercy of the winner of the Gold Cup, or the field is made up out of the tagrag and bobtail of the Cup entry, either animals which have been beaten in Thursday's race, or those which are so moderate that it was not thought worth while to start them.

There are fourteen events which close and name at Newmarket, including the Biennial for 1906 and 1907, which failed to fill when it was originally advertised, and it has been reopened. Thirty entries are required. There are six of next season's two-year-old races, including the Criterion Stakes, which will be run over the Bretby Stakes Course. The only handicap is the Babraham Plate of £1,000 at the Craven meeting, to run over the last mile and a half of the Cesarewitch Course.

The only events at Goodwood are the Ham Stakes for 1907 (open to mares in foal), and the Gratwicke Stakes for 1908 (also for mares in foal).

The City and Suburban Handicap and other events at the Epsom Spring meeting have the same conditions as usual. The most important event closing at Epsom is the Coronation Cup (£1,000 in money and a piece of plate value £200) on the third day of the Summer meeting, to run over the Derby Course. We shall no doubt find Pretty Polly entered for this race, also Zinfandel, who won it last season, defeating Sceptre and Rock Sand.

There are numerous events at Liverpool, including the Spring Cup of £1,000, the St. George's Stakes of £2,000 (for now foals), to run at three years old, and the Great Lancashire Breeders' Produce Stakes of £2,000 (for mares now in foal), to run at two years old. Both these events are to be decided in July, 1907.

The pig-headed stupidity of race managers has long been proverbial, and when they have once decided on a particular policy they persevere in it, even if the result is disastrous, with a truly asinine pertinacity. The Manchester Cup was a complete and ignominious failure last season, although it was, I believe, the richest handicap of the year, there being £3,000 of added money, and the sweepstakes also going to the winner. The race, however, was killed owing to the inconceivably idiotic arrangement of closing it in January, although it was not run until the end of May. Can the managers of the meeting be so hopelessly infatuated as to suppose that when the race failed with last year's liberal conditions it can possibly be expected to succeed now that it has been converted into a subscription handicap, with an entrance of £5, an additional £15 for acceptors, or £30 for starters? Here we have a handicap for which the weights are to be published on May 11, the race being run on June 16, and, if you please, entries are to be made next Tuesday! What can be the object of this fatuous haste to close the race? It would have been more in accordance with common sense to have kept it open until May 16, and to have published the weights after the Epsom Summer meeting. If the sixty entries which are stipulated for should be forthcoming next week, I shall be vastly surprised; and my sentiments will be shared by all persons who know anything about such matters, and who regard racing affairs in a practical way.

Only twenty-two entries have been obtained for next year's Champion Stakes at the Newmarket Second October meeting, and a small subscription could only be expected, considering the singularly unattractive pecuniary conditions. The class of the entry, however, is very good, and there are the materials for a most interesting race. Major Loder has engaged Pretty Polly, and among the other three-year-olds are Mr. de Rothschild's St. Amant, Mr. Musker's Henry the First, Mr. Alexander's Andover, and Mr. Gilpin's Delaunay. The only four-year-olds are Captain Forester's Hackler's Pride and Lord Howard de Walden's Zinfandel. Among the two-year-olds are Plum-centre (nominated by Lord Alington), Lord Rosebery's Cicero, Mr. Fenton's Vedas, Mr. Henning's Rouge Croix, Captain Orr-Ewing's Thrush, and Sir E. Vincent's Rievaulx and Shah Jehan.

The entry for the Newmarket Triennial, 1907-1908-1909, has been published. Among the notable mares are the Duke of Portland's Memoir, covered by Orme; Mr. Theobalds's La Reine (dam of Volodyovski), covered by Florizel II.; Mr. Musker's Minera, covered by Chevening; Duke of Devonshire's Lady Villikins (dam of Full Cry), covered by Orme; and Lord Howard de Walden's Golden Blaze, covered by Cyllene; and Glass Jug, by St. Maclou.

The foreigners are very anxious to buy Cyllene, whose price, I hear, is £40,000. Mr. Rose's horse, who is certainly the most successful of the younger sires (putting aside Flying Fox), is now in his tenth year, and his breeding is quite perfect. Cyllene and Flying Fox both descend from Stockwell, but M. E. Blanc's horse inherits the excitable blood of Galopin; whereas Cyllene comes, on the dam's side, from a quieter line. Cyllene, indeed, represents what many good judges consider to be the ideal cross of Stockwell and Touchstone, as, on the dam's side, he descends from Hermit, who was a son of Newminster and a grandson of Touchstone. Cyllene has two strains of the Touchstone blood, while Flying Fox is similarly endowed with the Galopin blood.

I observe that a gushing enthusiast has become excited about the mating of Sceptre with Cyllene, and asks what the yearling will be worth. I dare say that if a yearling thus bred came into the market there would be plenty of mooncalves ready to bid in thousands for the animal, on the strength of its pedigree. The creature might prove a flyer, or (just as likely) it might not be able to win a selling plate. The first produce of Memoir was expected to achieve great things, solely on account of its pedigree; but it turned out worthless for racing, and she has been a most abject failure at the stud. Considering Memoir's high breeding and her excellent performances on the Turf, it is certain that she would have sold for £10,000 if the Duke of Portland had parted with her at the end of her racing career. As matters have turned out she must have cost her owner at least £6,000 in keep, stallion fees, and forfeits for the produce. Again it was the same with La Roche, another of the Duke of Portland's Oaks winners, who went to Orme after she broke down when running for the Chester Cup. It was then remarked in more than one sporting paper that bidding would run high for the yearling if it came into the market. As a matter of fact, the produce proved to be utterly worthless, and La Roche seems likely to turn out as doleful a disappointment as Memoir.

St. Amant, who is now in Hampshire, is being practised over hurdles in the hope that his temper may be thereby benefited. Mr. de Rothschild's horse is heavily engaged next year, but in my opinion he will never do any good over a longer distance than six furlongs. The descendants of St. Simon can usually race, but they are a dreadfully nervous breed, and are often cursed with execrable tempers. By the way, it would be well if the Stewards of the Jockey Club prohibited the new and objectionable practice of excusing bad-tempered horses from taking part in the preliminary canter before the race. The production of such brutes is a pernicious nuisance on all accounts, and certainly should not be encouraged. They are a dangerous pest when on the Turf, and on retiring to the stud they usually become the sires of animals of the same odious disposition. If a horse is upset by taking part in the usual gallop before the race, then he must be upset, and there is an end of the matter. The authorities are really over-considerate to the point of imbecility, for it is preposterous to grant any privilege to an owner because his beast behaves like a mad savage. The number of bad-tempered horses has greatly increased of late years, and it would be more to the purpose if steps were taken to discourage them, instead of their being constantly and ostentatiously favoured. By the way, what a torrent of florid laudation there was about St. Amant after the Derby, and how clear it is now (as was maintained after Epsom in Truth) that it was an utterly false-run race. With the usual weather, Gouvernant would have won the Derby, but M. E. Blanc's colt was so hopelessly demoralised and upset that he might just as well have been in his stable. It is a curious fact, remembering all the eulogistic ding-dong about the merits of the placed horses in the Derby, that not one of them has won a race since Epsom.

The Jockey Club does not often receive presents, and it is odd that members have not made a habit of giving the society a picture of any of their horses which have exceptionally distinguished themselves. Sir James Miller has lately given the Club a portrait of Rock Sand. The members received a handsome snuff-box from William the Fourth, which was made from one of the hoofs of Eclipse, and mounted in gold. The Club possesses an admirable portrait of Admiral Rous, by Weigall. It is strange that there should be no memorial at Newmarket of Frederick Duke of York, who was long a member of the Jockey Club, and a most staunch supporter of the meetings, which he regularly attended during the spring and autumn. After racing all day on the Heath, the Duke of York was in the habit of playing whist all night at Cheveley, where he usually stayed with the Duke of Rutland. He was the only Bishop who was ever a member of the Jockey Club. When only a few months old the Duke was given the Bishopric of Osnaburgh, a very rich piece of preferment, which was tenable by a layman.

There was an excellent and most praiseworthy new departure at Newmarket during the Second October meeting, when the Stewards called a jockey before them for foul riding, not in consequence of a complaint, but because they had themselves observed the wrongdoing. It may be hoped that this precedent will be generally followed, as nothing imaginable could be more calculated to stop the frequent misdeeds of jockeys. During the past season rumours of foul riding have been scandalously frequent, but if Stewards will only keep their eyes open, and do their duty, this evil will assuredly be abated before long.

The Duke of Portland was assuredly very lucky in winning the Eclipse Stakes with such a moderate colt as Darley Dale, but his colours have been exceedingly unfortunate for some years past, and they certainly deserved a good turn. However, if the Duke's racing stud has been carried on at a considerable loss he has all the time been compensated by drawing a large annual revenue from his breeding stud in the form of stallions' fees. The Duke of Portland's interest in racing affairs is now exceedingly languid, and Epsom Summer, Ascot, and Goodwood were, I believe, the only meetings at which he has been present this year. Every one round Welbeck would be glad to see a decided turn in the Duke's racing luck, as a large sum out of his winnings on the Turf in the late eighties was devoted to building an extensive range of almshouses, and his country neighbours benefited in other ways by his successes. It was rumoured lately that the Duke of Portland had decided to give up racing, but that the breeding stud at Hunciecroft would be carried on as usual, the yearlings being sold at Newmarket every summer. However, the Duke at present has fourteen horses in training at Kingsclere, including Darley Dale. The most promising of the six older animals is Pamflete, by St. Simon out of Mneme, who was a really smart two-year-old last season when at her best. Pamflete has nineteen engagements in the future, the first of which is the One Thousand, and for this race the filly seems to have an excellent prospect of success, as the public lot which are entered are by no means animals of very high class, there being, indeed, nothing better in the list than Verdiana, Full Cry, Galantine, Queen of the Earth, Amitié, and Wetaria. Of course, Adula may turn out a flyer when she makes her appearance on the Turf, and Monarda, half-sister, by Florizel II., to St. Amant, is expected to improve enormously on her miserable two-year-old performances. Pamflete is also in the Newmarket Stakes and in the Oaks, but she will meet all the best English colts in the former race, while the Epsom event seems likely to fall to M. E. Blanc's filly Muskerry, who is very smart, and probably considerably superior to any of the English two-year-olds. The Duke has eight two-year-olds, all bred by himself, including fillies by St. Simon out of Settlement, and by Orme out of Memoir, and colts by Isinglass out of Mrs. Butterwick (winner of the Oaks) and by St. Simon out of Ismay, the latter being own brother to Darley Dale.

So far as the Derby is concerned, the hopes of the Kingsclere stable will be limited to Plum-centre and to Polymelus, but neither of these animals need be thought of in connection with Epsom while the French colts, Cicero, and Rouge Croix are on their legs. Lord Crewe has a yearling own sister to Polymelus, named Lady Cynosure.

The Dullingham Plate at the Newmarket Second July meeting, which failed to fill when originally advertised, has closed with thirty-eight entries after being reopened. The only present interest in the list lies in the entry of three-year-olds and upwards, and it is most satisfactory to find that Zinfandel has been engaged by Lord Howard de Walden. The King's horse Mead is also entered, and among the other now four-year-olds is Lord Ellesmere's Kroonstad, who was one of the disappointments of last season. Among the now three-year-olds are Sir J. Thursby's John o' Gaunt, Captain Forester's Queen's Holiday, Mr. Joel's St. Denis, and Mr. Musker's Admiral Breeze.

Twenty-three two-year-olds are entered for the Chippenham Plate of £500 at the Newmarket First Spring meeting, including Mr. King's Comedian, Sir E. Vincent's Rievaulx, Lord Wolverton's colt by Persimmon out of Perfect Dream, Sir E. Cassel's Prudent King, and Mr. L. de Rothschild's Khammurabi. There is really no room for a race of this class during the First Spring meeting, which already has an ample number of events for three-year-olds, what with the Two Thousand, the One Thousand, and the Hastings Plate.

The Tudor Plate of £1,000 at the Sandown Park Spring meeting has obtained forty-three entries. This is a race for then three-year-olds which were maidens at the time of entry. There are some notable animals in the list, including Major Loder's dark filly Adula, own sister to Pretty Polly; Mr. L. de Rothschild's Monarda, half-sister, by Florizel II., to St. Amant; and Sir F. Johnstone's Plum-centre, who was much fancied for the Dewhurst Plate, but he was palpably backward when he ran for that race.

Mr. Vyner's colours have been seldom to the fore during the past season. He at present has sixteen horses in training at Newby, his place on the Ure, near Ripon, eleven of which are yearlings, all of which were bred by their owner. Mint Mark is a colt by Queen's Birthday out of Minthe, Curracha is a filly by Tarporley out of Fallow Chat, and Brook Mint is a filly by Crowberry out of Watermint. Three of the yearlings are sired by King Crow. Minting, who is the sire of a filly out of Orthoryx, was not named after the herb, as has so often been stated, but after a Lincolnshire parish in the neighbourhood of Gautby Hall, the old seat of the Vyner family.

Sir Richard Waldie-Griffith's colt by Ladas out of St. Ia was expected a few months ago to prove himself an animal of very high class, and when his owner's racehorses were offered for sale at the Newmarket First October meeting, he was reserved at 5,000 gs. The colt did not change hands, and his autumn form was so poor that I do not believe he would have fetched 1,000 gs. if he had been put up at Newmarket last week. The St. Ia colt has nearly twenty engagements in the future, but he need not be thought of in connection with any of the classic stakes. It is indeed highly probable that the dark colt Shilfa, by Isinglass out of Merle, will turn out to be Sir R. Waldie-Griffith's best three-year-old. This great slashing colt was so backward, and he so evidently wanted time to develop, that it was wisely decided not to train him as a two-year-old. He is altogether a most promising colt, and has remarkably good action. Shilfa forfeited no fewer than nineteen engagements last season, and he is entered for twenty-one races still to come. His first engagement as a three-year-old is the Newmarket Biennial, and he is entered also for the Craven Stakes, which race is run two days later. Shilfa has two nice engagements at Ascot in the Ascot Derby and the St. James's Palace Stakes, with a maiden allowance in each race. As the colt needs plenty of time in order that he may grow to maturity without being knocked about, he will no doubt be treated easily during the early part of next year, which renders it probable that he will not be seen out before Ascot.

The Duke of Devonshire at present has twenty-two horses in training at Newmarket, of which ten are untried yearlings. Of the older horses the two-year-olds Full Cry and Quick are probably the best. Full Cry, by Flying Fox out of Lady Villikins, was very unlucky last season. She had been tried a certainty for the Princess's Plate at the Newmarket First July meeting, but she got off badly, and was beaten by a head by Galangal. Full Cry won the Prince of Wales's Sweepstakes at Goodwood (one of the richest two-year-old races of the season) and she was then looked upon as an animal of high class, and was regarded as likely to win the Champagne Stakes at Doncaster. She, however, unluckily went amiss, and was out of form during the remainder of the season. I am told that the Duke's filly is to undergo a special preparation for the One Thousand, and every one would be pleased to see his colours successful in so important a stake, as they certainly have been singularly unfortunate for several years past. A high opinion was entertained of the two-year-old Mon Roy, by Orme out of Mon Droit (dam of Dieudonné), when he was a yearling, and he was entered for no fewer than forty-eight races, but he has never yet started, and there is no reason for expecting that he will ever much distinguish himself on the Turf. The yearling relative to Full Cry is a colt by Marco. There are two Galeazzo colts among the yearlings, and colts by Persimmon out of Claque, by Isinglass out of Burgonet, and by Diamond Jubilee out of Lady Sneerwell. The Duke of Devonshire spares no expense in the management of his breeding stud, but I doubt whether East Sussex is a good district for rearing thoroughbred stock.

In Ireland there exists a body called the Committee Controlling Irish Representative Cricket. The hon. sec. of this body is Mr. Gillman. He has tilted a pretty joust of the pen with Mr. Lacey, the Secretary of the M.C.C. The Irishman is an easy winner. In this island folk are complaining that cricket matches are becoming dull, and that there is no life in the old game. The remedy is at hand. Get a few Irish county secretaries, and there will be any amount of fun. This Committee's sole duty is to look after Irish representative cricket. In July Mr. Gillman wrote to the M.C.C. asking if the two matches between the Gentlemen of Ireland and Cambridge University, and the one against the South Africans would count as first-class fixtures. "No," said Mr. Lacey; "the team should be All Ireland." Mr. Gillman replied: "The side was representative of All Ireland, the teams sent were first-class, the matches were for three days. All your requirements are satisfied." Mr. Lacey tried to get out of the hole by saying that the side was not played as a representative side of "All Ireland." But Mr. Gillman never gave him a chance. "If," he asked, "the words 'All Ireland' are required, how came you (the M.C.C.) to recognise as first-class matches, the matches played by the Gentlemen of Ireland team sent over by our Viceroy two years ago?" In September I commented at some length on this correspondence, and I expressed a desire to see how the M.C.C. would get out of the corner. Well, the Committee of the M.C.C. met on November 7 at Lords, and on its instructions Mr. Lacey replied that the Committee regretted that they had not been told that the teams were representative of All Ireland cricket. Primâ facie they represented only amateur cricket. There was no evidence to show that there were no professional cricketers in Ireland. In arriving at their decision a precedent was followed which had worked satisfactorily. "The recollection of what they had done in the past should refute the idea that they were unwilling to encourage Irish cricket." Now, in the whole of the correspondence there is not a shred of evidence to show that the matter was ever considered by the Committee before November 7. This letter was the first intimation. So Mr. Gillman writes back: "What was the decision of your Committee? What was the precedent referred to?" Thereto Mr. Lacey answers: "I have sent my Committee's answer. Unofficially, I suggest that the teams should be called 'All Ireland.'" Whereupon the Committee of Irish Representative Cricket arose in its wrath and resolved in a portentous resolution that it regretted the inconclusive character of the reply of the secretary, that the Irish Committee was still unaware of what the decision and precedent referred to were, and that it had no recollection of the M.C.C. ever having done anything to help Irish cricket. I must say that the M.C.C. deserves all that the Irishmen have given. They have certainly given freely. A more stupid, tactless piece of bungling it would be difficult to imagine. Having made a bad mistake, the Committee could have corrected it. They erred owing to their colossal ignorance of Irish history, Irish geography, and Irish natural history. Any child knows that there are neither snakes nor professional cricketers in Ireland. But that knowledge comes not from compulsory Greek which the Committee of the M.C.C. learned. When, too, will officialdom learn to say "We have made a mistake?" The M.C.C. should clearly have said: "Those matches are first-class matches. Owing to our mistake we regret that the scores were not included in this year's averages."

I am glad to say Mr. Gillman was invited to come to the meeting of first-class county secretaries. Matches have been arranged for Dublin University and the Gentlemen of Ireland against Essex. I am very glad that the Essex team has been able to do this. The M.C.C. will also help any leading cricketer taking a team over there. I hope the Irishmen will stick to the title "Gentlemen of Ireland." Their gentlemen players do not hold posts as deputy-sub-assistant-county secretaries.

The fifth test match of the Australian tour is to last to the end of the season if necessary. It is to be played to a finish if its decision involves the winning of the rubber. A correspondent wrote to the Marquis of Granby to know if there will be a sixth match, if, as a result of the game being finished in three days, each side has won one match. The Marquis has replied that the county fixture list renders this additional match impossible. The query that is raised shows the utter absurdity of playing so many test matches. The business is overdone from a cricketing, though not, I admit, from a gate-money, standpoint. Three test matches and one each against really representative teams of the Gentlemen and the Players is the arrangement I should like to see carried out. These test games have too much importance attached to them. It is mere dust and ashes worship. And the last one, if it is a deciding one, is to be played under entirely different conditions to all the others. A new test is to be applied for the deciding test match!

I do not know to what extent the Amateur Rowing Association is affected by political influence. At the same time, there is no doubt that its decisions ought to be accepted with the greatest possible respect. There is one decision that should recommend itself to the tribunal of The Hague, the North Sea Commission at Paris, and, above all, to the Russian Government. It has decided that there is no such thing as neutral water. International complications need not be feared. It has limited its decision to boat-racing. I am glad of this, for I once asked a leading oarsman what was meant by neutral water. Did it mean water into which neither or either crew could go, and, if so, when a crew took another crew's water, wholly or in part, to what extent was either, and, if so, which crew in neutral water? He was very much annoyed. He will not be worried again, and I shall have to take rowing legislation quite seriously.

To the man who hopes to get away to Sweden or Switzerland for skiing, skating, or tobogganning at Christmas time, I can imagine nothing more distressing than to be laid up with a touch of influenza that is bad enough to keep him indoors if not in bed, and just alarming enough to make his physician warn him of lung troubles if he attempts to get out and about before he is fit. I am moved to this expression of sympathy from a note a friend sends me. He had promised me a long description of a trip he was making to Sweden for skiing. And now he has nothing to look forward to but a round of fog and damp until next term begins. I can only cheer him by reminding him that there are others.

It is very satisfactory to know that the Home Office will look with favourable eye upon any private member bringing in a Universal Lights Bill. At present the variations in different districts and counties are simply absurd. The cyclist and motorist would rejoice if such a Bill were passed. The Home Office will not take action because of the farmer's cart. Why the farmer's cart, going from one field to another, should excite so much sympathy I do not know. It is better, I suppose, that a dozen cyclists or drivers of traps should be smashed than that one cart should show a light. By the way, I know of a parsimonious and wealthy squire who drives late every afternoon into a neighbouring township. When he gets into the boundary of the town he lights his candles, and carefully blows them out on leaving the town. His ambition is to die very wealthy. A universal lighting-up Bill would be a terrible shock to him. The Treasury might get certain duties.

Stock Markets Inactive — Christmas Influences — Generally Good—The Russian Bogey.

OWING to the occurrence of the Christmas holidays, which necessitates the printing of this issue of Truth earlier than usual, my article will for a change be short. As very little business has transacted I am the better able to compress my remarks. General conditions continue good, and all the indications—with one possible exception—point to a resumption of active markets at rising prices as soon as the holidays are numbered among the things of the past. The one possible exception arises out of the Russo-Japanese war and the attitude of Paris. In the early part of the year I drew attention to the chance of a fright on the part of French holders of Russian securities, and at one time, when a panic broke out on the Paris Bourse on a Saturday afternoon, it looked as though such a contingency was not remote. We in this country do not regard Russian bonds with favour, but small investors up and down France, and (to a smaller extent) other parts of the Continent are holders of these securities to the extent of over £400,000,000, having bought round about par, under the impression that they were acquiring the stocks of a strong—an impregnable—country. But for the support of the Russian Government and of the big French banks (which could not afford to see a smash if it was possible to avoid one) we would probably have witnessed a heavy slump in Russians. Thanks to that support quotations have been maintained in the neighbourhood of 92, when by all the rules, the disasters of the war and the raising of fresh loans should have sent them down perhaps to 75 or even lower. The French investor has not been buying Russians since the war—has, on the contrary, been realising quietly, and what with this and the enormous quantity of new scrip with which they have been loaded, the banks have become more heavily loaded than they can afford to hold. In the circumstances it will be seen that the situation is an ugly one. It is aggravated by the revolutionary outbreaks in Russia itself, and though this may be converted into a "Bull" point if it necessitates the retention of troops at home instead of their despatch to far-off Manchuria, the immediate prospect is not good. Any heavy selling of Russian bonds by the French people would demoralise the Paris Bourse, and as I have before had occasion to point out, that market has been buying very freely of Kaffirs and other things from us, helping to a return of buoyant conditions. The Russian menace apart—and I would not emphasise it, although it cannot be ignored altogether—the outlook is good. The slackening of business just prior to Christmas is only in accordance with custom and the condition of things. In the New Year the abundance of money will be a very potent factor for good, and if we see any sign pointing to the early cessation of the war, our markets will not be slow to accept the omen. In the meantime I wish my readers the compliments of the season, and a profitable year in 1905.

The Cure of Consumption.—The weighty testimony reproduced below should go far to influence sufferers from this terrible disease to place themselves in Dr. Alabone's care:—Sir Edward Buck, LL.D., K.C.S.I., writes:—"I have recently witnessed the rescue from the brink of the grave to a sound and happy life of one who had been condemned by all experts and friends, who knew the sufferer, to an early death. must be confessed that the earnings are at the moment indifferent, but this fact is due to temporary causes, and with only four exceptions the earnings of the leading lines for the half-year will show increases. The position to date is shown in my table below:—

With the aid of economies of working, which seem reasonably assured, the dividend showing will prove to be relatively satisfactory—a maintenance of rates in nearly all instances and increases in one or two cases. Early in January there ought to be considerable activity in the market because of the dividend speculations and the release of much Government and other interest payments, some of this money invariably finding its way into Home Railway investment stocks. There are few items of interest to which attention can be drawn. Values have shaded to some extent here and there, but the losses are insignificant. North-Westerns have eased owing to profit-taking after the announcement of the working agreement with the "Leeds" Company for the pooling of traffic in the South Lancashire district; but being full of a half-year's dividend, and likely to lead the forward movement which will soon be induced by the improving condition of trade, "Brums" make a promising purchase for investment. Metropolitans are lower, consequent upon the publication of details of the new capital requirements, in respect of which a Parliamentary Bill has been deposited. Powers are to be asked for £800,000 in Preference or Ordinary stock, with £260,000 of Debentures. It seems a fair inference, having regard to the recent issue of Convertible Preference stock, that the electrification of the system is costing more than had been thought. On the other hand, the Company appears to have made an excellent bargain with the Great Central, the terms of the agreement being issued this week. The Great Central will pay £20,000 a year as rent for the Metropolitan line from Canfield Place to Harrow for continued use in respect of its through traffic; but it will not compete for local traffic between Marylebone and Harrow. A further rental of £44,000 a year will be payable by the new Great Central and Metropolitan Joint Committee in respect of the present Metropolitan line north of Harrow. Towards earning this rent the Great Central agrees to provide through traffic to the value of £45,500 a year gross. If any profit be earned beyond this rental it all goes to the Metropolitan up to £5,500 a year, and afterwards is divided equally. The Metropolitan will receive a rental of, in all, £64,000 a year, and still be left in sole control of the local traffic from London to Harrow. At a meeting of the Chatham Company this week the shareholders approved the issue of Three and a Half per Cent. Debentures to the amount of £1,250,000. In case it should be thought that it is in contemplation to add £43,750 a year to the Preference charges, it may be pointed out that the new stock is mainly required to liquidate the existing debit balance on capital account, which on June 30 last reached a total of nearly a million sterling. Of this sum about half represents the amount due to the South-Eastern Company, whilst further, the Company had Lloyd's Bonds outstanding to an amount of £182,485 and a temporary loan of £60,000. The substitution of Debenture stock for floating debt may in the long run produce an actual saving in interest charges. My table follows:—

It is probably unnecessary to say that there have been very few dealings in the American Railway market, at the instance of the British public, and the professionals here and in New York appear to have given themselves over to the debilitating effects of Christmas. The tone of the market, however, shows a further improvement, the effect of the Lawson scare having worn off pretty well despite the further and horrible revelations of frenzied finance which the gentleman has published. The outlook for Americans is uncertain. The situation has been rendered much healthier by the reduction of the top-heavy "Bull" account, and in some good quarters they are talking of a resumption of the upward movement early in the new year, the reasons being found in the rapid improvement in the trade of the country, and the absence of tariff legislation. On the other hand, the people who are behind Mr. Lawson may think it advisable to bring about a lower level in order that they may resume on better terms the "Bull" pool tactics, which were so successful last autumn. The whole market is one which a prudent speculator will be well advised to avoid. My table shows the movements during the week:—

Dealings in Steel Trust stocks have been fairly active, but mostly on American account, and the Preference is talked to par on the strength of the improvement in the steel trade of the United States. Southern Pacifics were bid for at one time by the Gates clique, but they have lost much of their rise. There are no other features, but at the time of writing the sentiment on Wall Street is "Bearish." Canadian Pacifics have moved up and down with Americans without much business being done in them. They are worth buying now because in time they will go higher on sheer merits, and if the "Bull" movement in Americans is removed in the new year they will be good for an early advance. You might buy on this last assumption if you are prepared to hold, should the movement not come about. Concerning Grand Trunks there is not much to say. The financing proposals in connection with the Pacific extension scheme were confirmed at the meeting on Monday, when the President said optimistic things about the new line. The market, not caring to look very far ahead, scarcely liked the possibility of present sacrifice, and the Company's junior stocks, after hardening at first, now show a reactionary tendency. Otherwise there is no change in the position. The chief interest of the moment centres round the junior stocks and their prospects of improvement in the new year. These prospects seem to me to be quite good—given a moderate sort of winter—for comparison of earnings will be with small totals in the first quarter of the current year. Mexican and Argentine railway stocks have shown scarcely any fluctuation, but the latter have been firm, Rosarios in particular on a continuance of the very excellent earnings.

Gambling on the Stock Exchange.

I agree with the writer of the appended letter that stockbrokers who engage in operations involving large "differences" with men whom they know to be salaried clerks ought to be made an example of by the Stock Exchange Committee. Happily I am glad to think that, for their own sakes, there are few brokers willing to take the risk—apart from the higher question of the morality of the thing:—

Dear Sir,—In the Wednesday's issue of the Daily Telegraph in reporting the heavy defalcations to the extent of £22,000 by the Secretary of a Company, it is mentioned that the Recorder expressed his surprise that the prisoner, as the well-known servant of a limited company, should have found it possible to carry on such extensive speculations on the Stock Exchange. The general public will no doubt join the Recorder in his surprise, especially as an impression seems to exist throughout the City that the Committee of the Stock Exchange do all in their power to suppress gambling on the part of salaried servants. But my experience does not exactly confirm this. As Manager of a Company I discovered that one of its clerks carried on extensive speculations with a firm of brokers. His time was more taken up with these speculations than with his duties, and the consequence was that he lost his situation.

I wrote to the Committee of the Stock Exchange drawing their attention to the facts and giving the name of the brokers. I received a very courteous reply, stating that they had interviewed the broker and that he had given them a very satisfactory account. Not being content with this "very satisfactory account," I wrote again to the Committee and pointed out that the dealings amounted to hundreds, if not thousands, of shares every account, and that the clerk not only had lost all his money, but had become heavily involved with money-lenders. In reply to my second letter, the Committee replied briefly that they had nothing further to add to their previous communication.

Stock Exchange brokers are not novices in the City, and are generally pretty cute. I should think that a firm of brokers who receive for differences £22,000 from a man whom they know to be a salaried clerk, should have their suspicions aroused.

It would be very interesting for the community to know whether the firm of brokers who acted for the Secretary before the Recorder have been called before the Committee of the Stock Exchange.

In my opinion this gambling will never be put a stop to until some energetic measures are adopted against brokers who do the transactions for the class of persons referred to. I remember a case as far back as 1883 in which the Secretary of a Bank abstracted securities to a very large amount, and in that instance the broker was placed in the dock with the Secretary, and the sentences were twelve years and fourteen years respectively. Until such exemplary treatment is more generally adopted, I fear that dishonest clerks will continue to rob their employers with impunity to pay the losses incurred with their brokers. I should like to know whether others have had experience similar to mine.—Yours faithfully,

Manager of a Public Company.

Kaffirs Bought from Paris—Quietening Down Towards the End—More Dividends—Labour Position—Mr. Wernher and the Coolies—Premier Diamonds Lower—Jagers Strong—Deep Levels.

Business in Kaffirs as in other descriptions has been curtailed by the approach of the holiday, and by the imminence of another settlement, the carry-over in the Mining sections commencing immediately on the re-assembling of the House on Tuesday. In these circumstances the disinclination to open further commitments can be readily understood. At first the market displayed something like animation, a lot of good buying orders being sent over from Paris. Towards the end, the Continental interest slackened off, and thus the hopes of those who calculated that the week would finish on Friday (the House was closed on Saturday) with a display of buoyancy were disappointed. Instead there was an easier tendency, a few selling orders coming over from Paris towards the end. Still, the under-tone of the whole market remains remarkably firm, and provided nothing untoward develops in Paris as a consequence of the weakness of Russians, the new account is likely to prove an active one. The inherent position is strong — the mining industry continues to make headway, thanks to the assurance of a proper labour supply, domestic and alien, the open account is of quite moderate dimensions, prices are at a level which ought to tempt speculators, and the ease in money which will come with the turn of the year. Another batch of dividends is announced—27s. 6d. per share by the Ferreira, 3s. per share by the Ginsberg and New Primrose, 1s. 6d. per share by the Rietfontein "A," and 4s. per share by the Village Main Reef. These amounts compare with 22s. 6d. by the Ferreira, 3s. by the Ginsberg and New Primrose, 2s. by the Rietfontein "A," and 3s. by the Village Main Reef last December. Considering the disabilities ruling until quite recently, these results can only be regarded as very satisfactory. A favourable impression was created by Mr. Julius Wernher's statements respecting Chinese labour at the recent Fraser and Chalmers meeting. Mr. Wernher said he was informed that by the end of the year there would be 27,000 coolies in South Africa, and that a cablegram just received from China intimated that it was hoped two more shipments would be despatched this month and five more in January. Meantime, a small consignment of 236 coolies have left Hong Kong on board the Ikbal. Among the older favourites, Goldfields have again been most in request, but support has come along for Rand Mines, Modders, Gold Trusts and some others. Barnato descriptions have held their ground, and New Primrose have been bought on the official statement that instead of four years only, the life of the mine is, as a result of a recent re-survey, estimated at ten years. General Mining and Finance have improved on the introduction of the shares on to the Paris Bourse (where they have been well received), coupled with the good results for last year, a cable stating that the profits amount to £450,000, and that a dividend of 20 per cent. will be paid. In the Diamond group Premiers have reacted slightly on profit-taking, but De Beers, after being dull on the reduced dividend, are now being supported, and there is strong buying also of Jagers. Deep Levels have held their position well—improved it in a number of instances—in spite of slack business. My table is appended:—

RHODESIANS QUIET—MORE ABOUT ALLUVIAL—CHARTEREDS STIMULATED—BANKET SETTLEMENT DIFFICULTY—MOLE ATTENTION TO WESTRALIANS—TONE BETTER—ASSOCIATED RECOVER—LAKE VIEWS—L. AND W. A. EXPLORATION TO THE FRONT—WEST AFRICANS IDLE—BIBIANIS—MISCELLANEOUS MINES.

The Yule-tide atmosphere which has pervaded the Stock Exchange during the past week has naturally restricted dealings, and there has hardly been any pretence at business in the Rhodesian, West Australian, West African, and Miscellaneous mining markets. But the tone generally is fairly satisfactory, and in regard to Rhodesians, the mail advices from Sir William Milton confirming his cables served to help Chartered shares. It must be confessed that there is nothing that could be termed definite in his communication, nor anything exhaustive, but the tenor of the document is optimistic as the "possibilities appear to be enormous." The specimens of the gold are extremely small, and it may be remarked that this report seems to indicate a much greater area of alluvial than was at first thought, but, of course, it must not be forgotten that these utterances are more or less inconclusive, and that before any estimate of its value can be arrived at the Chartered Company's engineer's scientific investigation into the find must first come to hand, and this is not likely to happen for some considerable time. However, this report seems to stimulate Chartered shares, which maintain their position well, and, except for a few of the lower priced things, other Rhodesians are fairly steady. Among the Banket descriptions, both Exploration and Lomagundas have manifested an easier tendency in the absence of support, and the New Banket shares developed some weakness at the special settlement owing to the difficulty experienced in carrying over. Considerable offering resulted, but later on they exhibited quite a fair amount of strength. The Northern group has been devoid of interest. More attention has been paid to Westralians, speculators evidently being attracted by lower values prevailing, and, the supply of stock being somewhat short, this has served to assist a slight upward movement. Associated, after a somewhat dull start, picked up smartly, and all the other leading descriptions show slight gains. A small Colonial demand sprang up for Lake Views, as a result, no doubt, of the recent strike, but on receipt of less satisfactory advices the shares reacted. Among the "Little Kangaroos," Northern Terrors have turned on the down-grade again in consequence of a circular from the management implying that the response to the appeal for the new Debentures is small, and if it does not improve, reconstruction seems inevitable. Rather favourable statements uttered at the meeting concerning the value of the Company's investments led to a smart advance in London and West Australian Exploration shares, which maintain their higher level fairly well. In the West African, the tendency continues somewhat firm, but business has been virtually non-existent, consequently features are scarce, and where movements have occurred they are small and insignificant. Very little encouragement was forthcoming at the Bibiani meeting, but, on the other hand, the mere trifle of £25,000 is asked for to enable a continuance of operations, though it may be remarked that the Company is "now relying entirely on the proceeds of gold to meet the whole of the expenses and obligations." The ore reserves are estimated to total 150,000 tons of an average value of 15 dwt., and though it is hoped that working costs will eventually be reduced to 30s. per ton, the margin of profit does not seem very inspiring, having regard to the market valuation of the shares.

In the Miscellaneous Mining market, Copper descriptions have moved erratically within narrow limits, and exhibit no feature of especial interest. Renewed weakness has occurred in Etruscans as the result of another discouraging return from the property. Indians have been disposed to droop fractionally, Champion Reefs, Nundydroog, and Ooregums being all lower, but on the other hand New Zealanders have turned on the upgrade again, more especially Waihi Grand Junctions. Egyptians remain idle and somewhat dull, the report of the Nile Valleys helping a set-back in the Company's share, notwithstanding that it covers the year to July last, and as it will be remembered that many encouraging developments have occurred since then, the value of the document is not very great. It is anticipated that the balance of the shares unissued—46,993—will be issued during the next few months, and that the capital necessary for thoroughly testing the propositions will thus be obtainable, but otherwise no statements of importance are made.

American Exploration Company.

About a month ago I devoted some columns of Truth to a consideration of the affairs of the American Exploration Company, and the conclusion I arrived at after an investigation of the facts—including a number of interesting details which I did not think it necessary to emphasise at present—was that the whole affair was a poor sort of American fraud, worked by and for the benefit of a San Francisco gentleman of the suggestive name of Gammon, the Exploration Company existing as a kind of agent for the placing among fools in the United Kingdom of the shares of the concern's syndicates—companies formed for the ostensible purpose of working promising mining propositions in the State of California, which propositions I have every reason for believing to be abandoned holes in the ground of an altogether hopeless character. A correspondent who drew the attention of the Exploration Company to my two articles, and asked for an explanation, tells me that the answer given to him was that a reply to my criticism had been sent. I have only to say that no reply has been received by me, and the further my inquiries go, the more convinced I am that the people who have been deluded by the gentleman Gammon into taking up the shares of the La Fiesta and Eclipse Syndicates should make a point of getting their money back—if necessary, by calling in the aid of the law towards that end. Gammon is an American adventurer who is over here in order to make money out of what he calls "fool Britishers" by peddling shares in the rotten subsidiaries of the American Exploration Company. If he has anything to say on the subject of my recent remarks, the columns of Truth are once again at his disposal. Meantime, Mr. Gammon is sending out screeching circulars of the old misleading type. The latest of these resembles the bucket-shop literature of such eminent firms as Mayward, Grant, and Co. or Herbert Smith in the emphasis which it lays upon possibilities and in the prominence which it gives to dissimilar analogies—similes unlike, in the phrase of the poet. For instance, it sets out in prominent type that "developing prospects is the most profitable business on earth," that 2s. 6d. invested in developing Belcher—nothing is said as to what Belcher is, or where it is, or why it is—returned over £300; and that colossal fortunes are being quickly made by developing prospects in the goldfields of Western America. It appears from the Mining and Engineering Review of October 1 that "last week four hardy-looking miners registered at the Merchants' Hotel at Tonopah from Goldfields: each of these men had accumulated over $1,000,000 in the incredibly short time of ninety days from the ledges of Goldfields." But I do not see what this interesting fact has to do with the American Exploration Company. The new mining district of Goldfields is situated nowhere near the places in California where the La Fiesta and Eclipse are said to be located—I believe it is in quite another State; and to suggest that what has happened several hundred miles away is happening, or will happen, on a couple of worked-out and bleak holes in California is to convey an altogether erroneous impression and to lay oneself open to a prosecution for the obtaining of money by false pretences. I have not the space to deal here with all the select tit-bits out of the latest circular which the engaging Gammon has sent out, but there are some things which I would not like readers of Truth to miss. You all know Senator Jones and Seth Cook? Well, a small sum spent in developing Crown Point when it was a prospect made these men millionaires, and the shares of the prospect advanced from $1 to $2,200 in a few months. In case you may be deluded into supposing that the shares of any of the American Exploration Company's syndicates will give similar returns, I think it desirable to state that the La Fiesta has been in existence for more than three years, and has found nothing of any consequence or promise. Says the egregious Gammon:—

A share in an American Exploration Company Syndicate is worth from 20 to 50 times as much as it would be were our syndicates organised on the usual plan

I do not care to dispute the contention. I only know that an American Exploration Company Syndicate share has so far not been proved to be worth a cent, and if it is all the same to the fascinating Gammon I would much rather have a few shares in, say, the Crown Point prospect, or even in the Tonopah affair, out of which each of the four hardy-looking miners who registered at the Merchants' Hotel in that leading city made a modest quarter of a million sterling while a three months' bill was maturing.

"Truth" Letter Box.

Correspondents will oblige by observing the following rules:—

Name and address, which must accompany all inquiries, should be written on the communication; cards are apt to be lost or misplaced, causing unnecessary trouble.

Anonymous letters will not in any case be attended to.

I cannot reply to inquiries by letter or telegram.

A nom-de-plume or initials (the former preferably) should be given if it is desired that the real name shall not appear in the paper.

Inquiries should be put as briefly as possible, plainly written, and numbered.

Communications received after Friday may not be replied to in the following issue. Delay may also occur where an exceptionally long list of securities is submitted.

I do not recommend brokers.

Government Securities.

Ingens.—The best selection of Foreign Government stocks which I can suggest to bring in about 5 per cent. are Argentine B.A. Water, Chilian 1892, Chinese Fives 1896, Cuban bonds, and Mexican Fives. R. E. E.—1. The San Paulo loan is fairly attractive. 2. Greek Monopoly bonds might be kept. V. L. S. The Johannesburg Fours are a good purchase. The stock brings in rather over 4⅛ per cent. City of Melbourne stock ought to be held. Against the 5 per cent. issue of the Melbourne Harbour Trust is the fact that it is redeemable in 1908-9. E. D.—There is no need to worry over the interest on your Japanese bonds, and if the war comes to a satisfactory termination there will be a good recovery in values.

Railways.

J. McLaggan.—There seems room for a material appreciation in North British Deferred during the coming year, but I would rather not commit myself to the assertion that it will touch 60. Chilterns.—The highest figure touched by North Western Ordinary Stock this year was 159¼, and last year 170¾. I do not see why it should not go again to the latter figure with trade improving. But you must not expect it to get there with a rush. Wykamist.—Cuban Central Railway Ordinary £10 shares look cheap at the current price, and might be bought for a small turn, as the country is prospering. Athenæum.—I recommend Great Central, 1872, Preference, Grand Trunk Guaranteed, Canadian Pacific Preference, and B. A. and Pacific 1st Preference Stocks, which will give an average of over 4 per cent. D. D., Bournemouth.—Antofagastas and San Paulos are good of their class. Major, R.E.—You can obtain a more attractive Home Railway Stock than Furness Ordinary. Try Great Northern Deferred or Highland.

Mines.

Independent.—1. Your Kaffirs are not a particularly bright lot, but they might be kept for the present. They will probably have some appreciation when the market goes ahead. 2. I am sorry that I cannot help you. St. James's.—Nile Valleys and United Africans will probably harden again before long. Daggafontein Prospecting shares are a promising speculation. Pigg's Peaks are good to hold. Sea Wave.—The Kaffirs should have an average rise of 20 or 25 per cent. within another two months. The life of the Meyer and Charlton is estimated in Mr. Mabson's "Mines of the Transvaal" at eight years. Thornhill.—Great Eastern Collieries are a fair speculative purchase. The present price is 15s. I cannot give you the "life" of the property. M. Moody.—Kalgurlis, Oroyas, and Sons of Gwalia might be chosen with Great Boulders if you want a fourth. Lock.—The Great Mount Lyell Copper Company has been reconstructed as the Ballarat and Lyell. I am unable to ascertain the value of the shares. Write to the Secretary at 39, Broad-street House, E.C. Earlstown.—The offices of the North Nile Valley Company are at 68-74, Palmerston House, E.C., and the offices of the Egyptian Mines Exploration Company at 15, Great St. Helens, E.C. Douglas.—Hold your South Africans for the present. Transvaal Goldfields should be kept for 4, South African Gold Trusts for 8, Johnnies for 4, and Simmer and Jack for 3½. Other good speculations are Rand Collieries, General Mining and Finance, and (among Westralians) Sons of Gwalia.

Miscellaneous.

Castleman.—I do not regard them as at all reliable, and would not recommend dealings. Merely a bucket shop. Shrewd.—1. There is nothing attractive in the offer, and you ought not to accept it. 2. The high rate of interest offered is not compatible with the security of your money, and I would not recommend the institution. 3. With your capital you ought to be able to obtain a fairly remunerative partnership, but you must exercise a great deal of caution in the matter. Ansley.—I do not consider the practice satisfactory, and would not recommend dealings with any outside brokers. Dubious, Bristol.—There is not much cause for alarm in regard to your holdings. The depression which has been noticeable in the brewery division is the result of the realisations of deceased account, etc., and before long the tendency ought to improve. W. H. H., Walsall.—1. After the recent experience you ought not to dabble further. 2. I see no great attraction in Gramophones. 3. At the present price, Pryce Jones Preference return about 4¾ per cent. and the Debentures just 4⅝ per cent. Chronos.—The first is a very notorious bucket-shop, which you ought to avoid, and the second is equally unsatisfactory. Staleybridge.—You might hold on to your Nitrate shares. The prospects seem favourable enough, and they may go higher before very long. Devereux.—Again many thanks for Stephens and Henderson's latest circular. They are still working on the old lines, I see. W. R. A.—Leave the London and New York Exchange severely alone. I have frequently had occasion to discuss their fatuous systems in the columns of this paper. Beatrice.—In the circumstances I think you might as well hold on for a higher level of values and then cut your loss. J. Lyons make a fairly good holding, as the business is progressive and profitable. Grouse.—The concern is one of the most unreliable as well as undesirable bucket-shops in existence, and you and your friends ought not to be misled. The second concern alluded to is equally untrustworthy, and both ought to be avoided. Verax.—Fairly good as a lock-up investment for a couple of years. L. W. R., Norfolk.—I have not much faith in the institution. R. G. Cope.—It is highly amusing if one is conversant with such matters, but there are so many innocent people who are misled by the fanciful figures put forward that the joke is spoiled. I have already dealt with the system. Adalletta.—You ought not to pay any attention to the institution's circulars. Leave your money where it is, and it will be safer, because you cannot expect security when such a high rate of interest is offered in order to attract the simple. John Wilson.—The concern is very much over-capitalised, and I do not think it would be wise to increase your holding. Hindu.—Many of the shares in the lighting group make good investments, and are worth picking up. The yields are good, Metropolitan Electrics, for instance, yielding practically 5⅝ per cent., St. James's and Pall Mall 4⅞ per cent., and Westminster just over 5 per cent.

Mixed Investments.

Hallthorpe.—1. Send the certificates direct. 2. Close your "Bear" account in Kaffirs. M. E. L.—1. St. James's and Pall Mall and Chelsea Electrics would suit, the former giving 5 per cent. and the latter 4⅜ per cent. 2. Liptons might be kept for the present. The shares are on the upgrade, and might be good for a further rise of a shilling or two. 3. The Irish Land stock is a highly desirable investment. Piffer.—1. Babcock and Wilcox Ordinary and Threlfalls Ordinary should be held. 2. Lever Bros. Preference, Anglo-Argentine Trams Preference, River Plate Gas Debentures, and Fine Cotton Spinners Preference. 3. The process of recovery will, I fear, be slow, but it should be steady. O. H. C.—Whiteley's debs., Terminal Rotherham debs., Great Northern Preferred Ordinary, Bryant and May debs., and De Keyser debs. Chelt.—1. I understand that the business of one or two of the affiliated hotels is not good. In addition the reserve is small, and recent issues of capital have been rather large. 2. Illustrated London News debs. are well secured. 3. Peak Hills might be kept. The other is dead. Sabretache.—1. The concern is not known here. 2 and 3. I am unable to trace either concern. Kohinoor.—I should choose Antwerp Water shares, which give nearly 5⅔ per cent., and C. A. Pearson Preference, which give 5⅜ per cent. Pendennis.—Dick Kerr Preference, American Freehold Land and Mortgage Preference, and Cape Town District Gas Preference. Sniped.—1. I should not join the reconstruction. 2. The two Kaffirs are poor. 3. South-Western Deferred and Great Northern Deferred are worth buying now. Holland Park.—1. You did well to sell the Cosmopolitans. You might buy Sons of Gwalia. 2. Globe and Phœnix might be kept for a better price on a better market. 3. The selection is a good one. The South Africans should be good for a profit soon, and the new year ought to see a revival in Nile Valleys. 4. Ashanti Goldfields might be bought for a lock-up. 5. Sell Steel Common if you have a moderate profit. 6. Americans seem ripe for a further reaction before another "boom" is inaugurated. Speculator.—1. Orange Diamonds and Boksburgs might be held. 2. Sewing Cotton Ordinary shares are a fair speculative purchase with the condition of trade improving.

Industrials Idle—Waiting for the New Year—Tone Satisfactory—Textiles Again Active—Woolcombers' Successor—Iron and Steel Shares Firm—Trust Stocks Still Buoyant—Telegraphs and Telephones—Hudson's Bays—China Shares Strong Again.

Though business has been on a very modest scale, owing to the disturbing influence of the Christmas season, the tone of this section is tolerably good, and this seems to indicate that, provided no untoward events arise to administer another check to public confidence, the New Year will witness an encouraging revival of outside interest, which in its turn is almost sure to be reflected in a higher level of values. Perhaps the only approach to a feature worthy of mention has been the renewed bidding for Textile descriptions, arising out of the good reports concerning the American cotton crop, which is expected, as I have before hinted, to assist materially the various Companies engaged in one way or another in the industry. Coats improved to a slight extent, and with them Fine Spinners and English Sewing Cottons hardened, while Bradford Dyers have been well supported, and Bleachers, after being disposed to ease away, recovered again. From all accounts it would seem that Woolcombers, Limited, the successors to the unfortunate Yorkshire Woolcombers' Association, has done fairly well in the matter of subscriptions for the new capital, and the shares are quoted at a slight premium. In the Iron and Steel group, considerable support has been forthcoming for Pease and Partners, and John Browns present a better appearance; while in the armament division both Vickers and Armstrong maintain their ground well. The stream of investment buying of Trust stocks continues in the same quiet way, and is reflected in the slight improvements registered by a number of stocks, including Anglo-American Debenture Corporation, Colonial Securities Trust, Mercantile Investment, and Consolidated Trust. No material change is noticeable in the Brewery Section, where the tone remains heavy, and though movements have been somewhat irregular, slight losses easily outnumber the gains. Among Telegraphs, Easterns were twisted up a couple of points, and apart from Anglo-American Deferred, which continues to droop away, other stocks present a pretty firm front, and National Telephone issues remain buoyant. Lighting descriptions are very firm, no doubt the recent foggy weather inducing some support; and Dock stocks are tolerably steady; while, save for General Omnibus, which have reacted slightly, the traction group shows little change. Meat shares have been dull for choice, though Liptons, for an exception, have continued to make a little headway. Hudson's Bays are not quite so good, as a result of profit-taking; but renewed attention has been directed towards China shares, both Pekin Syndicates and Shansis making fair advances on balance.

QUEER STORY.

CHARLES EDRIDGE'S DISAPPEARANCE.

[Some forty years ago the mysterious disappearance of a hospital student was one of the Press sensations of the day. To the general public that mystery remained a mystery at that time, but the explanation has long been known to the family primarily concerned, and as all the actors are now dead there is no reason why it should not be published. It is given below, accompanied by extracts from the files of the newspaper which devoted most attention to the affair, the names alone having been altered by the present editor.]

* * * * *

(From the "London Daily Post" of June 11, 186—.)

"MYSTERIOUS DISAPPEARANCE OF A MEDICAL STUDENT.

"SOME stir has been occasioned in the neighbourhood of St. Philip's Hospital by the sudden disappearance, under mysterious circumstances, of a medical student attached to that institution. The young gentleman left the hospital at about half-past seven on Monday evening last, the 7th inst., to go to his lodgings, and he has not been seen or heard of since. On Tuesday, his relatives were communicated with, but they were unable to throw any light on the matter. The police now have the case in hand, and are prosecuting inquiries."

(From the same journal of June 12.)

"NO NEWS OF THE MISSING MEDICAL STUDENT.

"Our representative, who called at St. Philip's Hospital late last evening, was informed that nothing had up till then, been heard of the missing man. The Secretary, whom our correspondent saw, was very reticent, and declined to enter into any details. We understand, however, from another source that there had been some friction between the missing student and the authorities, of which we hope to print full particulars in our to-morrow's issue."

(From the same journal, June 14.)

"THE MISSING MEDICAL STUDENT.

"STILL NO NEWS.

"IMPORTANT COMMUNICATION MADE BY A FELLOW STUDENT.

"Nothing has yet been heard of the missing student. But our representative has seen a fellow-student of his, who has supplied him with the following important information:

"It appears that the name of the missing young gentleman is Mr. Charles Edridge. His age is twenty-two. Both his parents are dead, and his nearest living relative is an uncle, with whom he seems not to have been on the best of terms. Mr. Edridge is a young man of great parts and promise, as is witnessed by the fact that he had recently won the Beckwith Clinical Exhibition of £150 a year for three years. But a recent thoughtless escapade of his, which resulted in his being fined at the Marlborough-street Police Court, brought him under the unfavourable notice of the hospital authorities. They took the somewhat stringent measure of depriving him of his exhibition. Mr. Edridge's friend, who communicated these facts to our representative, did not conceal his opinion that the young man had been very hardly dealt with. For he was entirely dependent upon his exhibition for his support while walking the hospital, and the deprivation of it meant professional ruin to him. The unfortunate young man applied to his uncle, who declined to assist him. And all this preyed upon his mind to such an extent that his friend is strongly of opinion that he has made away with himself.

"While in no wise condoning young Mr. Edridge's conduct in respect of the matter which brought him up at Marlborough-street, we nevertheless entirely agree with our informant that the punishment meted out to him by the hospital authorities was unreasonable and excessive.

"It is, of course, possible that they may be able to put a different complexion on the matter. If so, we shall be pleased to publish their explanation."

(Same journal, June 15.)

"STILL NO NEWS OF MR. EDRIDGE.

"LETTER FROM THE HOSPITAL AUTHORITIES.

"LETTER FROM THE MISSING STUDENT'S UNCLE.

"The eighth day has come and gone, and still there is no news of Mr. Edridge. The presumption of suicide, to which we referred yesterday, gains ground. We print below letters received from the hospital authorities and from Mr. Edridge's uncle—with our own comments subjoined:

St. Philip's Hospital, June 13, 186—.

SIR,—Referring to the remarks made by you in to-day's issue of your paper, I am directed by the Board of the Hospital to inform you that it is their invariable practice to deprive of his scholarship, or exhibition, any scholar or exhibitioner who misbehaves himself in the manner in which Mr. Edridge did, thereby bringing discredit upon himself and upon the hospital. Such cases, indeed, are fortunately rare. But when they do occur, the Board always adopt the course which they have adopted towards Mr. Edridge; and they are astonished that a journal of your standing and respectability should have supposed any other line of conduct possible.

Mr. Edridge's friends among the medical students may think he has been hardly dealt with. Young men of that age, however, are not the best judges of these matters.

Moreover, the Board, in dealing with such a case, do not consider it their business to inquire whether the culprit has private means or not. (The italics are ours.—Ed. London Daily Post.)

That is his concern, not theirs. In any case, they claim the right to manage their own institution in their own way—without the doubtless well intentioned, but in their opinion uncalled for, interference of the press.

The Board, in conclusion, desire me to add that while they deeply deplore any rash act into which the unfortunate young man may have been led (something of the crocodile about this.—Ed. London Daily Post), they cannot hold themselves in any degree responsible for what is, after all, purely the result of his own previous misconduct.—I am, sir, your obedient servant,

JOHN THOMPSON, Secretary.

The Editor of the London Daily Post.

"We, in our turn, are no less astonished by the above letter than are the worthy Board by our strictures upon them in our yesterday's issue. In particular, the statement that "in dealing with such a case the Board do not consider it their business to inquire whether the culprit has private means or not," strikes us as particularly amazing. To a young man who has private means, or well-to-do relatives, to fall back upon, the deprivation of his exhibition is nothing more than a sharp and salutary lesson. Whereas, to one not thus fortunately situated, it spells ruin. In other words, the punishment in the latter case is out of all proportion more severe than in the former. Yet the Board, when sitting in judgment, do not consider it their business to discriminate between the two. It does strike us as marvellous that a body of men, presumably sane, should solemnly put forward so monstrous a proposition.

"In spite of these gentlemen's disclaimer of responsibility for Mr. Edridge's fate, we still hold that if it proves, unhappily, that he has committed suicide, his death will be at their door, and we are of opinion that the majority of our readers will endorse this view. We now give the letter of Mr. Edridge's uncle:—

907, Chepstow Villas, Bayswater, W.,
June 13, 186—.

SIR,—As you have dragged me, publicly, into this unfortunate affair of my nephew's, Mr. Charles Edridge's, disappearance from St. Philip's Hospital, thereby subjecting me to the greatest possible annoyance, I beg to inform you that I declined to assist my nephew on grounds which, in my opinion, were adequate. Whether that is so or not, I do not see that the matter is of sufficient public interest for discussion in the Press.—Your obedient servant,

HENRY TALBOYS.

The Editor of the London Daily Post.

"Before publishing this letter, which reached us yesterday afternoon, we sent a representative to interview Mr. Talboys. Our representative made it clear to him that, when stating that he had declined to assist his nephew, we had purposely abstained from making any comment, until we were more conversant with the circumstances; but that, if he would satisfy us in confidence, that he had had good grounds for his refusal, we were willing to publish a statement exonerating him from blame, without specifying (if he should prefer this) what those grounds were. Mr. Talboys curtly referred our representative to his letter, saying that he had nothing further to add, and upon our representative pointing out to him that his letter, in fact, contained no explanation at all, he flew into a rage, said he was d——d if he was going to be dictated to or interfered with in the management of his private affairs, and that our representative might go back and write as many lies as he pleased.

"From this, it will be seen that Mr. Talboys is a somewhat 'harbitrary gent.' We are, further, able to state, upon unquestioned authority, that he is a wealthy man, without children, and that he has never assisted Mr. Edridge (who is his godson as well as his nephew) even to the extent of a £5 note.

"In view of these facts, which we challenge him to dispute, we now express the deliberate opinion that this gentleman shares with the hospital authorities the moral responsibility for whatever fate has overtaken his unhappy nephew."

"THE MISSING MEDICAL STUDENT.

"SUPPOSED CLUE.

"REWARD OF £100 OFFERED BY THE HOSPITAL.

"MR. TALBOYS MOBBED.

"The detectives who have charge of the case were informed last evening that a young man, answering closely to the published description of the missing student, had offered himself at the Guards Depot for enlistment in the Grenadiers. A gentleman from the hospital at once started for the Depot to identify the man, who stoutly maintains that his name is White, and that he hails from Camberwell. Up to the present, the result of the identification has not reached us.

"We understand that a reward of £100 has been offered by the Governors of the hospital for any information that will lead to the discovery of the missing student.

"At about seven o'clock last night, an excited crowd assembled round Mr. Talboys' house in Chepstow Villas, booing, hooting, and making other hostile demonstrations. The attitude of the crowd became so threatening that extra police had to be sent for, who had some difficulty in dispersing the mob.

"We cannot but condemn the conduct of these misguided demonstrators; at the same time it would be idle to deny that they have some reason for their indignation. We understand that Mr. Talboys has applied for police protection."

"STOP PRESS NEWS.

"The man who offered himself for enlistment in the Guards proves not to be the missing medical student. The name and address which he gave have been verified as perfectly correct."

"THE MISSING MEDICAL STUDENT.

"A FURTHER REWARD OF £100 OFFERED.

"It is now nearly a fortnight since Mr. Edridge disappeared, and nothing has been heard of him. In spite of their utmost efforts, the police are completely baffled. Mr. Talboys, the missing student's uncle, has offered a further reward of £100, in addition to that offered by the hospital authorities. We congratulate him upon this tardy act of reparation, which we take to be tantamount to an admission that he has now begun dimly to recognise his responsibilities towards his unfortunate relative.

"If the young man is still alive, it is certain that one or more persons must be cognisant of his whereabouts. And we should think that a reward of £200 ought to prove an irresistible temptation to them to speak out. May it be so."

"THE MISSING MEDICAL STUDENT.

"IMPORTANT CLUE.

"Just as we are going to press, we learn that the hospital authorities have obtained an important clue to Mr. Edridge's whereabouts. We are unable to say more at present, but we hope to give full particulars in our to-morrow's issue."

"MISSING MEDICAL STUDENT DISCOVERED.

"SENSATIONAL DETAILS.

"Mr. Charles Edridge has, at length, we are pleased to say, been restored to his friends, alive and well. He has had a remarkable experience.

"It appears that the day before yesterday an elderly man, of somewhat ruffianly appearance, called at St. Philip's Hospital, and asked to see the Secretary. Upon being admitted into that gentleman's office, he hinted that he knew where the missing student was, and that he was willing to earn the advertised reward by delivering him up to his friends, on certain conditions. These conditions were that no questions were to be asked, and that the reward was to be paid him in cash, as soon as the missing man was handed over to the hospital authorities, alive and well. He further stipulated that no intimation of this offer should be made to the police. Unless he was assured upon these points, he should keep his knowledge to himself, in which event it was extremely improbable that the mystery of Mr. Edridge's disappearance would ever be solved. The Secretary, being somewhat perplexed how to act, said that he must have time to consult the young man's relatives and the governors of the hospital before he could give a definite reply; and it was eventually agreed that an answer should be addressed to the stranger in the Agony Column of next morning's Times.

When the man had left, the Secretary lost no time in seeing those of the hospital governors who were immediately accessible and also the uncle, Mr. Henry Talboys. The upshot was that a hasty conference of these gentlemen was convened at the hospital, at which Mr. Talboy's solicitor was also present. And it was finally agreed that, as the safe recovery of the young man, rather than the punishment of those who had been responsible for his disappearance, was the first and chief desideratum, the Secretary should be instructed to comply with the conditions demanded. A notice to that effect was at once despatched for insertion in the Times.

"The result was that, about noon next day, the ruffianly-looking stranger brought Mr. Edridge in a four-wheeler to the hospital, and handed him over to the Secretary. The young man appeared to be somewhat dazed and stupefied, as though he were just recovering from the effect of an anæsthetic. Otherwise he was perfectly well, and in no way the worse for his experience.

"His companion, having been paid the promised reward in Bank of England notes, hastily took his departure.

"Interviewed by our representative, Mr. Edridge told the following story:—

'When I left the hospital on June 7 to go to my lodgings, I took, as I have often done, the short cut through Bear-lane. About half-way along it, I encountered a knot of rough-looking men, standing outside a tavern, who stared at me hard, but allowed me to pass without attempting any interference. I had not, however, proceeded many paces before I suddenly felt myself seized from behind, a chloroformed handkerchief was pressed to my mouth and nose, and I lost consciousness.

'When I recovered, I found myself seated in a chair in a mean and dirty room. The window of the apartment was boarded up, and a couple of candles stuck in the necks of empty bottles, afforded the only light. One of the men, whom I had noticed in Bear-lane, was standing over me. At first, I was apprehensive that their object in kidnapping me might be personal violence or perhaps murder. But, to my relief, this proved not to be the case.

'I was known, it appeared, as one of the students from St. Philip's Hospital, and I was required to exercise my medical skill upon a member of their gang, who had been badly damaged in some criminal enterprise. If I complied with their demands, I was to be well-treated, though kept prisoner as long as they deemed convenient. But if I declined, there was a disused well at the back of the premises, at the bottom of which my corpse would be lying before midnight.

'Of course I had no option but to accept the terms. I found my patient in a very critical state, his skull being slightly fractured, while he also had a bullet in his abdomen, which necessitated an immediate operation. As I had no instruments with me, I suggested that I should be allowed to return to the hospital for them. But they laughed at me, saying that if I would tell them what instruments were required, they should be procured for me at once from a surgical-instrument maker's. This was done, and I performed the operation. It turned out successful, though for nearly a fortnight the patient's condition was critical, and he required the closest attention and watching.

'All that time, I was kept under rigid surveillance by one or more of my captors. I cannot, however, complain of any ill-usage. I was well treated, well fed, and, except for the dirt that prevailed everywhere, well-lodged. But they would not allow me to set foot outside the house, nor even to send a reassuring message to my friends, on any condition. And to this moment I have no idea at all as to whereabouts in London my prison was situated.

'A few days ago, I overheard two of the men talking about a reward which had been offered for my recovery, and soon afterwards one of them came to me and said that as the patient was now out of danger, they purposed restoring me to my friends.

'"But," said the fellow, "it's got to be done in our way. We ain't going to run no risk of having the coppers put on our track. So look'ee here. You must submit to be chloroformed, so as we can take you back to your friends without no risk of your spotting the locality of this here little crib."

'In spite of my assurances that this precaution was unnecessary and that, if I were allowed to go quietly, I would swear not to betray them, they insisted upon their own method. I was accordingly chloroformed, nor did I recover my senses until a few minutes before I reached the hospital. The man who was in the cab with me was a total stranger. I had never set eyes on him before. But, of course, he must have been one of the gang.'

"Such is Mr. Edridge's remarkable story, told in his own words. All, of course, is well that ends well, and the young gentleman has our cordial congratulations upon this happy termination of his adventures. At the same time, there is something rather appalling in the ease with which an unoffending citizen can be kidnapped in broad daylight in the public streets of the Metropolis. And while we entirely sympathise with the motives which led the hospital authorities and Mr. Talboys to act as they did, and to postpone every other consideration to that of Mr. Edridge's safe recovery, yet we cannot but regret that the criminals have been enabled to escape scot free.

"Perhaps, however, the police may even yet manage to run them to earth."

"THE CASE OF MR. EDRIDGE.

"We are delighted to learn that Mr. Charles Edridge, with whose strange story our readers are familiar, has been reinstated in his Clinical Exhibition by the authorities of St. Philip's Hospital."

* * * * *

Here, so far as the public and the Press were concerned, the matter terminated, and was soon forgotten. Some time afterwards, however, the Secretary of St. Philip's Hospital and Mr. Henry Talboys received each on the same day, through the post, a bank-note for £100. Either remittance was accompanied by this brief note:—

"Conshence munney from the chap wot blackmaled yu over the missin meddical stoodent."

The recipients of the money naturally supposed that this was a rare and signal example of penitence in a hardened criminal. But they never guessed that that ruffianly-looking personage was a humble friend of our medical student (a dock labourer, whose gratitude he had earned by some previous act of kindness) and that the whole affair had been a put-up job, the object of which was that Charles Edridge himself might earn the reward which he surmised would be offered, and so be enabled to continue his medical studies.

The young fellow no doubt reconciled himself to the imposture by reasoning that to make the hospital authorities and his churlish uncle bleed to the tune of a handsome reward would be an act of rough justice for their harsh behaviour towards him.

This is said rather by way of explanation than of justification, for the writer does not deny that young Edridge's device, ingenious though it was, was morally inexcusable. At any rate, upon being reinstated in his exhibition, he had the grace to send back the £200 (as from his ruffianly-looking friend), and he subsequently achieved high professional eminence.

MUSIC.

MUSIC IN 1904.

MUSICALLY the past year has been one of exceptional activity and interest, and this although, from the concert-goer's point of view, it has not perhaps been a very good one. Concerts have certainly been numerous enough—but that has been one of the difficulties. Few have paid. The concert given frankly for advertising purposes and without hope of its paying is becoming indeed commoner in London every year, though such entertainments can never be other than depressing for those who attend them. There have been special causes, moreover, to handicap ordinary artists giving concerts in London during the past twelve months—in the first place the boom in prodigies, and secondly the unprecedented number of charity concerts with "star" casts which the summer witnessed. In regard to the prodigies, it is certain that such an epidemic of juvenile geniuses has never been known before, though how many of them will "stay the course" time will tell. But two at least, in the persons of the twelve-year-old Von Vecsey, whose violin-playing seems to know no limitations, and Florizel von Reuter, who not only plays the fiddle, but also composes and conducts, are manifestly children of altogether abnormal endowments; while Sybil Keymer, Mabel Harrison, Paula Hegner, and "Carmen Sylva" are the names of others who have appeared in various capacities with more or less success, some of whom will doubtless develop in the course of time into artists of real note, as others will almost as certainly suffer early extinction from the premature exploiting of their talents. Nor do those who have been heard in London by any means exhaust the list, since several others, by all accounts equally gifted, have appeared on the Continent, and will doubtless visit us in due course. In the matter of its prodigies, 1904 must certainly be reckoned an annus mirabilis.

As to the charity concerts, this is a grievance of old standing, from which all but the most eminent of the profession suffer severely. In the first place, their own concerts, given on a commercial basis, cannot hope to compete with entertainments in which half a dozen "stars" join forces without fee or reward to attract the public. Secondly, they suffer by being compelled, or virtually compelled, to give their own services gratuitously. The remedy is for all performers appearing on such occasions to be paid at least half fees for their services, and a movement set on foot to this end last summer will, it is hoped, take effect next year. But such drawbacks notwithstanding, innumerable distinguished artists of one sort and another have, of course, been heard in London during the year, though, apart from the babes and sucklings named, there has been a curious absence of any newcomers of conspicuous note.

It has been in other ways, rather, that the year has been chiefly noteworthy. In the Elgar Festival given in March at Covent Garden there was, for instance, an event of real significance. There had, indeed, never been anything quite like it in this country before. Beethoven Festivals and Wagner Festivals, and even Richard Strauss Festivals, there had been, but never before had such an honour been paid to a native composer, and it testified forcibly to the amount of living interest which Elgar has succeeded in exciting in his music that the undertaking should have proved such an unqualified success. Later Elgar received his knighthood, and more recently still he has been appointed first Professor of Music at Birmingham University, so that in many ways his star has been in the ascendant.

But if the Elgar Festival concerts were a success, too many others, as already noted, were less fortunate. Those of the Kruse Festival, for instance, at Queen's Hall, though Weingarten was the conductor, and some splendid programmes were presented, attracted nothing like the audiences which they deserved; while serial concerts of such fame and standing as the "Pops" and the "Richters" have also both ceased for lack of adequate support. The Joachim Quartet concerts, on the other hand, were once again well patronised, as have been, too, among other recently-established chamber concerts, those run by Messrs. Broadwood. Then there have been the concerts of the newly-formed London Choral Society, which, under the energetic and enterprising direction of Mr. Arthur Fagge, has given many interesting performances, while in the matter of instrumental music, an event of the first importance has been the split in the Queen's Hall band over the deputy question, and the resulting formation of the splendid London Symphony Orchestra. Whether there will be work enough for two fine permanent orchestras such as London now possesses as a consequence remains to be seen. All will hope, at any rate, that such may prove the case. Meanwhile the first of the concerts given by the London Symphony players, under the direction of Dr. Cowen, Herr Nikisch, and Herr Steinbach respectively, have had an interest all their own.

In the case of opera the most noteworthy feature of the summer's doings in this way was undoubtedly Mr. Manners' plucky attempt to run an English season at Drury Lane concurrently with that of Covent Garden. The venture did not succeed, but at least much bigger audiences were obtained than many had ever expected to see. At Covent Garden a series of special performances under Richter were again a feature of note, but otherwise the season ran a sufficiently ordinary course. True, many fine singers—Melba, Calvé, and Caruso among them—once again appeared, and Saint-Saëns' "Hélène" and Massenet's "Salomé" were new works heard, but neither of the latter proved much to the taste of London opera-goers. The season was, however, understood once again to have paid its way, and that at least was something. Then more recently, of course, there have been the performances of the San Carlo Company, given under conditions and with results still fresh in the minds of all. In this instance, again, it is pleasant to know that at least some one contrived to make a profit, and there is talk already of a like season next year, which shall demonstrate still further the London public's readiness to patronise grand opera when it has the chance of getting this both cheap and good. Nor does this by any means exhaust, if rumour may be trusted, the operatic possibilities of the future—though to consider these further just now would be beside my present purpose. Enough that the recent venture certainly constituted a very notable sign of the times, and may, in due course, beget results of enduring value.

Another subject of consuming interest to many which has been greatly to the fore during recent months has been the question of musical copyright. At one time, indeed, it even looked as though legislative redress of a gross and admitted wrong would actually be obtained. The doughty opposition, however, of Mr. Caldwell, M.P., who constituted himself the champion of the oppressed and persecuted "pirate," averted this result, and the priceless boon of cheap stolen music is still enjoyed without let or hindrance by the multitude. How much longer Parliament in its wisdom will allow this happy state of things to exist is a question which continues to exercise many minds. Nor must I mention be omitted in this connection of that other and more legitimate boom in cheap music which, as though still further to increase the unhappy music-dealers' burdens, Messrs. Pearson, Cassell, and Harmsworth have, within the last few months, initiated. Here again is a development wherein, perhaps, the discerning may espy no little significance. An interesting event of another kind has been the institution of the Palmer Patronage Fund for the encouragement of young British musicians, while the celebration of Dr. Joachim's artistic diamond jubilee, the re-editing of "Hymns, Ancient and Modern," the issue of a revised "Grove," the opening of the Æolian Hall, and the foundation of the Concert-goers' Club have been other more or less notable occurrences of the year whose course will soon be run.

As to the actual music of the year, produced and performed, I do not know that there is a very great deal to say, or that any very distinctive tendencies have disclosed themselves either in the one case or the other. Among living composers Richard Strauss continues beyond all question the most interesting personality of the time, though we have not yet had the opportunity of hearing in England his most recent big work, the "Sinfonia Domestica," and generally his music has perhaps been less played in 1904 than during the year before. The attempt to create a Strauss boom has, in fact, so far failed, for the simple reason that his music is at present beyond the understanding of the multitude, who have only just succeeded in catching up "by painful steps and slow" with Wagner, and who are still a generation or so behind Brahms. Perhaps a certain amount of reaction on the part of some who were at first among Strauss's sworn adherents in this country has also been discernible; but, generally speaking, it is probably safe to say that his works continue steadily to gain admirers, as further hearing brings clearer comprehension of them, and the prediction may even be ventured that fifty or a hundred years hence they will be positively popular.

Next in interest to Richard Strauss stands undoubtedly, at all events for British musicians, Sir Edward Elgar, whose fame continues to extend both at home and abroad, with the result that practically for the first time for centuries we may now be said to possess at least one composer of international repute. If Sir Edward Elgar never wrote another line, therefore, he would have accomplished more than any other British musician in modern times, though it is the hope of one and all, of course, that he will go a great deal further before his course is run. In France, Germany, Russia, and elsewhere it is also the case, no doubt, that many of the younger men are doing important work of which we may learn more in time, but at present none has made any particular impression by means of such works as we have so far heard in London; and this is really the outstanding feature of the musical outlook as viewed from the threshold of 1905. Unless he be found in Richard Strauss, that eagerly awaited Messiah of universal acceptance, whose advent has now been looked for so long, has still to make his appearance.

The holiday season has brought the usual lull in the musical world and, save for the Sunday concerts, and one or two of a special character, the concert-goer's occupation will be gone, for some little time to come. There will doubtless be a good attendance, however, at the New Year's concert announced by the Queen's Hall Orchestra for Monday next, when Wagner's three early overtures, "Polonia," "Christopher Columbus," and "Rule Britannia," will be given for the first time in this country. Curiously, little seems known concerning any of these works. They were all composed in Wagner's youth, long before he had made his name, and thereafter either actually lost or completely forgotten—though that entitled "Polonia," composed in 1836 and inspired by the Polish troubles of 1832, was played at Palermo in the 'eighties, under Wagner's own direction in honour of his wife's birthday. Wagner's oft-quoted remark that all the energy of the British character seemed to be contained in the first upward run of our own "Rule Britannia," may also be recalled in this connection. On the same evening the "Messiah" will be given as usual at the Albert Hall with Miss Evangeline Florence, Mme. Clara Butt, Mr. William Green, and Mr. Watkin Mills as soloists, while the Sousa band is announced to begin a fortnight's engagement at the Queen's Hall on the following Monday.

Precisely why concerts in general should dry up so completely at this season of the year is, perhaps, not altogether obvious. With so many people making holiday, one would have thought that at least a moderate number of musical entertainments would find support. Concert-givers, as a class, are, however, the most conservative of folk, and since it never has been the custom for concerts in any number to be given at this period of the year, it is perhaps foolish to suppose that under any circumstances the rule could conceivably be broken.

A digest of the question of musical copyright and musical piracy, at once very concise and very complete, by Dr. Charles Maclean, is a useful feature of the monthly magazine of the International Musical Society (Breitkopf and Härtel) for December. The number also contains an interesting article on "A Lost Work by J. S. Bach"; another, by Fr. Niecks, on "Liszt as Pianoforte Writer"; and a third on "The Bach Motetts, to be Accompanied or Unaccompanied"? by Alfred Heuss, besides the usual careful summary of recent musical happenings all over Europe and other articles.

Talking of the piracy question, an amusing story reaches me of an encounter recently witnessed in a west-end thoroughfare between one of the members of the Corsair fraternity and the husband of a certain popular composer, in whose songs the former was doing a brisk sale. In the result, after an amicable interview the pirate bold was persuaded to enter a cab with all his stock-in-trade, and I understand that eventually not a little useful information was obtained from him. The man happened to be superior in education to some of his fellows, and acknowledged readily enough the nefarious character of his calling. But, of course, he had his excuse pat enough. How else could he make his 5s. or 10s. a day so easily? At the festive season the pirates' business is, of course, particularly brisk, and, for my own part, I confess I think these poor wretches far less blameworthy than the thousands of so-called respectable folk who deliberately buy the stolen goods.

Christmas has come and gone and with it its carols, but it is not too late, perhaps, to take note of some remarks regarding the latter recently ascribed to a worthy country clergyman (Archdeacon MacCarthy, Vicar of Gainsborough), who appears to take anything but a genial view of this form of Christian worship:—

> Bands of squalling singers often combine for begging purposes, and squall outside doors, desecrating beautiful hymns, and adding the horrors of strident, discordant shoutings or whinings to the darkness of our winter evenings. It is a peculiarly disreputable form of begging.

There is no doubt, considerable justice in the Archdeacon's observations. At the same time, one should distinguish. There are many beautiful old carol tunes still being sung entirely by ear and by tradition in our country districts, and so far from suppressing these, such tunes are often well worthy of being noted down and preserved. There is the more reason for preserving these genuine old specimens since the carol is an art form which it is impossible to reproduce nowadays. Both words and music alike defy the modern imitator. A certain naïveté of thought and speech is an essential element of the carol proper, and this is seldom to be captured by the most deliberate striving. Your carol can be simple, naïf, rustic as you like, but never "literary" or elaborate, and this is why so few good carols have been written in modern times.

And the true carol music is equally hard to imitate. The music of the carol has come from all sources, and just as the words have ranged from the solemnly devout to the riotously secular, so one finds the tunes drawn now from Piæ Cantiones, and now from the popular folk songs of the time. In France the best carol tunes have nearly all come from the songs or choruses of comic operas and popular dances. Even when Church tunes have been adopted for the purpose one finds them often most quaintly transformed to make them suitably lively for carol singing. The great fault of modern composers when they have attempted to write carol tunes has lain in making them too much like hymns. There are no carols like the old ones. It is quite a mistake also to suppose that carols originally were exclusively confined to Christmas. There were also spring carols, Easter carols, and summer carols (sung on the feast of St. John, Midsummer Day). But the carols of Christmastime were, of course, always the most numerous and important.

"The Exile Returns," a pleasing song whose words and music are by Helen Pearl Humphry (Monte Carlo Publishing Co.), of which I have received a copy, is interesting not only on its own account, but by reason of the fact that it is printed in two keys under one cover. The key difficulty is so often a source of trouble to the amateur who in choosing a song does not quite know whether this one or that will suit his (or her) voice best, that it is surprising that no one before has hit upon this simple device of meeting the case, and the practice might well be more generally adopted.

An Italian impresario has, I read, hit upon a novel method of suppressing the encore nuisance. This takes the form of the following notice posted up in the theatre: "Persons desiring encores of a piece in the opera, or a fragment of ballet, are requested to inscribe their names in the office, when the performance is over, and in consideration of the purchase of a second ticket by the inscribing persons, all the encores they wish for will be given." What is most surprising about this is perhaps the suggestion that Italian performers find encores a nuisance. Certainly if they do, those who were recently with us at Covent Garden dissembled their feelings on the subject with remarkable success.

Why are certain composers' names invariably misprinted? In the account of a recent concert I see the name "Rubenstein," thus spelt, twice over. And this is only one of many like enormities which printers of musical "copy" love to perpetrate. Thus "Glück" for Gluck is another for which they have an ineradicable weakness, though "Handel" for "Händel," a converse error, has of couse endured so long, that now it has become in England the accepted form. "Greig" for "Grieg" is another highly popular transposition (excusable perhaps in view of the composer's Scottish ancestry, while it is very rarely that Dvořák gets his full share of accents. As to Tchaikovsky, the choice of possibilities is bewildering indeed—the result, of course, of divers attempts to give phonetic value to the Russian original; it may be noted, however, in this connection that the form above adopted appears the one most generally accepted nowadays by the best authorities. Dargomijsky, Moussorgsky, and Rimsky-Korsakov are some other Russian composers whose names offer obvious temptations to the easy-going in such matters.

New York critics seem to have been considerably divided in opinion concerning Sir Edward Elgar's overture "In the South," some praising unreservedly what others found considerably wanting. "A powerful work highly coloured," says one; "Sir Edward Elgar might have more appropriately called it 'hay' music," is the verdict of another. "Melodies of sunny skies and Italian landscapes," comments a third; a fourth, on the other hand, observing that "Just what South the composer had in mind it is difficult to tell . . . perhaps the rigours of South Africa during the Boer campaign." The outsider may well wonder where is truth among these conflicting judgments.

Some correspondence which has recently appeared in the Musical News, under the heading "The Value of Degrees in Music," suggests that Sir Edward Elgar, when he comes into power as professor at Birmingham, will have ample scope in which to exercise his reforming instincts. Here is one question, for example, which it appears was recently set in a Musical History paper at Durham:—"Name the important work in which Handel has used both alto and tenor clefs for his violas." One may well agree with the correspondent who supplies this example of academic foolishness that it can hardly be an inspiring thought to a Mus.Bac. to reflect that he secured his degree on the strength of his ability to answer such questions as this. According to another correspondent the following was a paper set recently for A.R.C.M. (Theory)—the time allowed for its execution being three hours only:—

> (a) Write a canon in three or four parts (the subject was far from easy).

(c) Analyse the first movement of Beethoven's Op. 110.
(d) Score for orchestra the slow movement of the same composer's Op. 106.

It is hardly surprising to read that in the result only three passed out of twenty-eight. Certainly he would be an accomplished and facile musician who could acquit himself with credit of such a task as that allotted in the course of a fleeting forenoon.

The late Mr. Arthur Chappell, whose death has been so widely regretted, could have desired no happier epitaph than the sonnet which Browning, one of the staunchest supporters of the "Pops," in the olden days, wrote in his honour on the occasion of the thousandth concert of that famous series—now, alas! at an end; and as these lines are very little known, not being included in Browning's published works, they may perhaps be appropriately reproduced just now:—

"Enter my palace," if a prince should say—
"Feast with the Painters! See, in bounteous row, They range from Titian up to Angelo!"
Could we be silent at the rich survey?
A host so kindly, in as great a way
Invites to banquet, substitutes, for show,
Sound that's diviner still, and bids us know
Bach like Beethoven; are we thankless, pray?

Thanks, then, to Arthur Chappell—thanks to him
Whose every guest henceforth not idly vaunts,
"Sense has received the utmost Nature grants,
My cup is filled with rapture to the brim,
When, night by night—ah, memory, how it haunts!
Music was poured by perfect ministrants,
By Hallé, Schumann, Piatti, Joachim."

Of the great artists named Joachim alone survives to-day, and now Mr. Chappell has gone too, while the "Pops" are at an end and St. James's Hall is marked for destruction. Sic transit.

LETTERS ON BOOKS.

MY DEAR MR. WYNDHAM,—Mr. Samuel M. Hussey's "Reminiscences of an Irish Land Agent" (1) is over-consciously amusing and unconsciously instructive. It gives you an advocatus diaboli view of Ireland, while vehemently protesting a passionate love for its people. "It's the proudest boast of my life," says Mr. Hussey, "that I'm an Irishman, and the compliment which I have most appreciated in my time was being called 'the poor man's friend,' for I love Paddy dearly." That he should love such a cowardly, corrupt, ungrateful and murderous people is creditable rather to his Christianity than to his common sense. He endorses Judge Keogh's judgment of his fellow-countrymen: "Sir, I have the most implicit confidence in the invincible cowardice of my fellow-countrymen." He assures you that "Of course an Irishman would take a bribe one way and calmly vote another;" and that, "While one-half of the sons of farmers in Ireland have been or are members of the Irish Constabulary, a large proportion of the other, at least in the eighties, made up the bulk of the ignoble army of moonlighters, cattle maimers, and cowardly assassins crouching behind stone walls to shoot at an unsuspected victim in the opening." By the way, Mr. Hussey, with Pigott, classes Parnell with the moonlighters. "In all moonlighting affrays no one scoundrel ever became personally conspicuous as leader, and all the wisest leaders, such as Stephens, Tynan, and Parnell, shrouded their movements in mystery." Of the base ingratitude of the Irish Mr. Hussey gives an amazing instance: "To show you how short-lived Irish gratitude is, ponder over this: When Mr. Daniel O'Connell, son of the great Dan, stood for West Kerry as an Unionist, he was warned by the police officer that he could not be answerable for his life if he came into Cahirciveen." What ingratitude! To stand by the cause to which O'Connell gave his life when his apostate son forsook it! Indeed, Mr. Hussey is so eager to beat his dearly-beloved Paddy with any stick that he spoils an uncommonly good story in order to get another blow home on Paddy's skull: "Very true," he says, "is Sheridan Le Fanu's division of an Irishman's life into three parts:—The first is that in which he is plannin' and conthriving' all sorts of villainy and rascality—that is the period of youth and innocence. The second is that in which he is puttin' into practice the villainy and rascality he conthrived before—that is the prime of life and flower of manhood. The third and last period is that in which he is makin' his soul and preparin' for another world—that is the period of dotage." That would be a silly essay certainly from the pen of a grown man and notable novelist. The true version of the story, which I had from Lord Dufferin himself (who was a Sheridan) is that Sheridan Le Fanu, when a child of eight, came down late for breakfast, as usual, but even later than usual, to the scandal of his stern Puritan father, the Dean of Emly: "Sheridan, I ask you, sir, is this right?" cried his angry father, holding out a reproachful watch. "No, Pa, it's fast," replied that young gentleman; and for this flippancy he was condemned to write an essay on a subject of his own choosing, and wrote the above—not, of course, of Irishmen particularly, but of the human race at large. As the essay of a young scapegrace of eight, presented to an unco' guid father and Dean, it really is delightful. But Mr. Hussey could not resist the temptation to fling it as a stone at his fellow-countrymen. One more instance of his passionate love for "dear Paddy" I must give, before I say a word of the anecdotage of the book. "I think it was to Sir Henry Howorth that I recommended another panacea for the evils of Ireland, namely, that it would be a good plan to exchange Ireland for Holland, for the Dutch would reclaim Ireland, and the Irish would neglect the banks of Holland with the eventual result that the living Irish question would be washed away." "'Mrs. Harris,' says I, 'if I could afford to lay out all my fellow-critters for nothin', I would gladly do it—sech is the love I bears em,' said Mrs. Gamp." Mr. Hussey's stories suggest that there is a kind of tontine in witticisms whereby the last wit gets the credit of all the sallies of his predecessors. Certainly I heard in my boyhood many of the witticisms Mr. Hussey puts into the mouths of the latest generation of wags. However, there are many new to me, and probably legitimately fathered—especially those attributed to Judge Morris:—"There was an action brought against a veterinary surgeon for killing a man's horse. Lord Morris knew something of medicine and asked if the dose given would not have killed the devil himself. The vet., drawing himself up pompously, said, 'I never had the honour of attending that gentleman.' 'That's a pity, doctor,' replied Morris, 'for he's alive still.'" Here are two witticisms of the Dublin gods:—"'Would there were a mirror in my side,' said the heroine of the piece to her lover, 'that you could see my heart.' 'Wouldn't a pain in your stomach do as well? It's myself has wan to spare,' shouted a voice from the gods." "Lord Chancellor Brady, who was a convivial soul, was gazing at Jenny Lind through a portentously enormous lorgnette. 'Brady, me jewel,' shouted down one of the gods, 'I'm glad to see ye're fond of a big glass yet.'" Perhaps the most really characteristic story Mr. Hussey tells of the Irish peasantry is that of two farmers who stood security for the discounting of a bill presented by a drunken priest, who was soon after unfrocked. Next day the two farmers walked back into the bank with the money. "What's the meaning of this?" cried the manager. "Well, yere honour, we couldn't stay in the parish if we refused his riverence, though we knew it would be a bad business for us. So we got him a little hearty on the way home at his own expense, and then picked his pocket of the money, and here it is. He'll ax the congregation to make up the amount next Sunday." I confess that one of the stories that tickled me most was the Dublin detective's shadowing Mr. Hussey's wife all over Cork under the impression that she was the Fenian leader, Stephens, disguised as a woman! I do not know when I read a story that held me so breathless from start to finish as "Major Weir" (2). Every element that ever was heaped and packed into a melodramatic tale seems crowded into Miss Montgomery's novel; but the masterly handling of these sensational elements is the reverse of melodramatic. Any other contemporary novelist, I really think, would have been overwhelmed by the immense mass and distracting variety of the material employed in the structure of "Major Weir"; but it is handled by Miss Montgomery with an ease and effect that are wonderful in a second novel. If, as critics hold, a second novel is the crucial test of the staying power of an author, there is no doubt at all that Miss Montgomery has come to stay. Much of the power of this fine novel, I ought to say, is due to its style, racy, idiomatic, and vigorous, if occasionally too precious for my taste. If you like a book of sport, and good sport, too, in the disguise of a novel, I can recommend you "Glencairly Castle" (3); but the story is to the shooting and fishing as Falstaff's ha-porth of bread to an intolerable deal of sack. Mr. Rudyard Kipling stands where he did and where he has stood since he wrote "Plain Tales from the Hills." He has never advanced one inch, if he has not, indeed, occasionally retrograded. In his last book, "Traffics and Discoveries" (4), he is at his best when he is not preaching; but alas! he cannot resist blowing a Big England bugle blast under the pretence of playing a tune, whether merry or plaintive. It is no doubt a credit to the sincerity and fervour of his patriotism or imperialism, but it spoils his stories. If only he would write more of such exquisite stories as "They," and less of such tracts as "The Army of a Dream"! You think of Elia's "Dream Children" that had never been, as you read of "They," the children that had been, and were not and still are. There are often discords in Mr. Kipling's best work; but in the "Return of the Children" scene, scenery and personages—everything is in perfect tune with this idyll of the revenants. What shall I say of "The Heart of the Vicar" (5)? It is the vulgarest book in thought, talk, incidents, and personages I have had the misfortune to glance through for a long time.—Believe me, my dear Mr. Wyndham, ever yours very sincerely,

DESMOND O'BRIEN.

GIRLS' GOSSIP.

DEAREST AMY,—A happy New Year to you! Have you had some hundreds of cards? The nicest wishes we received were the following:—

A lyttle health, a lyttle wealth,
A lyttle house and freedom,
And at the end a lyttle friend,
And lyttle cause to need him.

and another runs:—

Remembrance for the Past,
Good wishes for the Present,
Bright hopes for the Future.

Is not that nice? It came from a very celebrated friend. A third good wish is very good indeed, as well as comprehensive:—

To wish you joy, good health, and great success,
And everything on earth that adds to happiness.

I borrow all of these, and wish them all to you!

I paid a visit to Mr. John Kirk at the Ragged School Union in John-street, Theobalds-road, and saw whole roomfuls of useful and amusing things being sent away to poor children in every part of London. There were clothes, shoes, boots, go-carts, perambulators, toys of every kind, including some from the nurseries and schoolrooms at Marlborough House. But with all these quantities of things many requests for toys have to be refused. Why do not wealthy people follow the example of the Princess of Wales, and send away the overflow of their own children's abundance for the enjoyment and benefit of the poor? It is so easy. Packages of cast-off clothing, of old boots and shoes, of picture-books, toys, balls, slates, games, bricks, and so on. The addressing of them is not difficult;—Ragged School Union, 32, John-street, Theobalds-road, London, W.C.

It does not matter how shabby the footgear may be, for a few of the poor cripples at work in a room off Farringdon-street turn them out like new. We went and saw the boys at work, and admired, indeed, the hearty energy the poor fellows put into their occupation. All are cripples, two have curvature of the spine, one is paralysed. Yet they were knocking and hammering away as busily as bees. These boys are paid by the R.S.U. from 5s. to 9s. a week, according to their earnings, and they are receiving what is of far greater value than money—viz., training in discipline, punctuality, and obedience. Their teacher, quite a young man, keeps them well up to the mark, and is in this way doing for them more than he divines.

Mr. Kirk gave me a copy of a book just published, "Sixty Years in Waifdom," which gives an account of the Ragged School Movement in English history, beginning from the day when Lord Shaftesbury made his successful speech in the House upon the condition of the nation's children. That was the beginning. Since then what a wonderful development. Barnardo's Homes, industrial schools, Board schools, technical schools, and now imminent Free Education for the masses. The book is as interesting as any novel. Do send for a copy to the publishers, Chas. Murray and Co., Ludgate-square, E.C.

One of the rooms in the grand old house in John-street (there is a magnificent Adams ceiling in the erstwhile drawing-room) is devoted to the correspondence kept up between the children of the rich and the youngsters of the ragged schools. Some of the letters come from China, India, Japan, all over the world. Each young correspondent writes to a child of her own age, and sometimes the bond develops into a lifelong kindness and goodwill. I wish I had time to tell you more about it.

Betty is joining a delightful tour got up by a lady of position, and leaving London on February 1. It is planned to last three months, and all the principal towns of interest in Italy will be visited, finishing up with the Italian lakes. One or two more ladies are wanted to complete the lucky number seven, the lady who is organising it being the eighth. With that number she is able to arrange good terms at hotels and pensions, and in that way keep expenses low. The tour will work out very moderate in price. The tours organised by Messrs. Cook and Lunn are admirable, but there are many who do not care to go so quickly over the interesting ground as is necessary with these tours. Mothers would be delighted to hear of a means of giving a daughter a charming trip under the chaperonage of a gentlewoman. Find somebody, for Betty is most anxious to have all arranged so that her thoughts may cluster round the trip as bees do round lime-blossoms. It is so nice to be able to enjoy a pleasant thing in advance.

Here is a new way of earning money, and, in my opinion, a very good one. A young lady living at Streatham, and obliged to work at home because she cannot stand the long hours, has undergone a course of training at a good milliner's, and now undertakes the renovation of hats, toques, and bonnets. She brings them smartly up to date, and has a whole crowd of letters from clients who have been pleased with results. This young lady also goes into the country and renovates any number of hats she can manage in the time, using ladies' own materials. Good idea, is it not?

An acquaintance who lives near Bishop's Stortford has been telling us about the so-called Macedonian gypsies who are being personally conducted through several south-eastern English counties by an attentive escort of police. Our friend asked us if we had ever heard Louie Freear sing a song with a recurrent indignant refrain, "Blowed if father ain't begun to work," to which she gave much scornful emphasis. Equally amazed and disdainful were the aliens (neither Macedonians nor gypsies, by the way, but Germans) when asked what work they could do. "We don't work," they said, in the queerest patois. "We like to go about and do nothing. We heard that England is the best place for that." A Hertfordshire paper describes them as being very picturesque, but a "shock-headed, shackle-backed, slovenly lot, with habits approximating to those of the beasts of the field." When they are ill they put on leeches. When they are hungry they steal any food they can get. It is a primitive method, and they complain that it is not understood in England. And yet a return to their own country is the last thing they desire.

I see by a wine-merchant's circular that claret is going rapidly out of favour, and Colonel Newnham-Davis has just been telling the world that wine is not understood nowadays. Cigarette smoking has destroyed men's palates. Would it not be a strange reversal of things if we women, because we do not smoke (it is rapidly going out, you know) should become the arbiters of excellence in wines and chatter knowingly of vintages? What a revolution that would be!

The English brocades I told you of are of great beauty, and I am glad you are going to look at some samples. Those I chose for you are, I think, perfectly lovely, especially the rather Japanese design of miniature hydrangeas in pale green and gold colour or pearl grey shot with orange. Perhaps you will prefer the Marshal Niel roses with pale green foliage on pearl grey. It is certainly lovely and very soft and supple in texture. You must, before choosing, remember that brocades are either rich and imposing or exquisitely soft. One of the samples in your parcel belongs to the former category. Is it not magnificent, with its snowy cyclamens and pale gold stems on a ground of pearl-white, backed with gold? For your cousin's wedding-gown you will, I think, like the lovely white brocade scattered over with roses and wild flowers and straying ribbons, all pure white.

Alys has just had a lovely theatre bodice made of a very similar white brocade, trimmed with her beautiful old Alençon lace, and paste buttons. She has had a little sable tail introduced, and has achieved an artistic triumph.

I have also asked Liberty and Co. to include in their samples of brocade some patterns of their soft satins, now so much worn, and their brocaded silk crêpes. The colours are so tempting that you will probably begin by wanting about twenty dress lengths of both materials.

In Lady Broome's interesting and amusing "Colonial Memories" (published by Smith, Elder, and Co.) she says that when the babies were christened in the Island of Rodriguez, a black relative of the infant's remarked, when it cried: "C'est peut-être Monsieur le Diable qui s'en va?" The superfluously polite way in which the native woman spoke of the enemy of man seems rather out of place. When Lady Broome was a child a gipsy fortune-teller on Cannock Chase insisted on looking at the sole of her foot, and pronounced that it would wander up and down the earth, north and south, east and west. How copiously this prophecy was verified you must read in the book itself. In the chapters on Trinidad a unique table decoration is described, an apparently endless procession of ants climbing up one table leg, each appropriating a bit of scarlet flower from the table, flinging it across his shoulder, and carrying it off down another leg of the table.

"Tom! you've been cooking something," I said when, calling one afternoon last week at his office, I noticed that he was turning down his turned-back cuffs and perceived a delicious smell. "Yes," he said with great enjoyment, "something good." You know the way he says it, with a long-drawn-outness that makes you quite hungry in a moment. "Let me taste," I begged. "You can't," said Tom. "It's only preparatory, a stuffing for a steak that I'm going to do for supper," and he took me into his absolutely perfect little kitchen, all rigged up by himself, and showed me his Ardent cooker, with three angular granite stewpans, fitting into each other on the top, and making a circle. I begged him to tell me what on earth the stuffing was made of that it smelt so very tempting. He was a little vague, and merely dropped out some words such as kidneys, mushrooms, truffles, chopped, mixed, string, marrow, and then he faded off into mere mumbling. So that I knew that he did not mean me to have the recipe. But I shall try chopping all those nice things and stuffing a steak with them and letting it roast before the fire, and will let you know the result.

Tom is never happier than when cooking. His kitchen is about 10 ft. square, and every implement that a cook could need is hung from a crossway piece of wood by a pulley that lets it down and swings it up again when done with. You will be amused to hear that he prefers a wine bottle to the ordinary rolling-pin. His reason is that it is far more easily cleaned. He is quite right, and you will also laugh when I tell you that he makes the pattern round the edge of his pies and tarts with a tortoiseshell hairpin. The association of ideas is not agreeable, but the pin in question had never been used except culinarily.

This reminds me to tell you that you must do your hair in the Grecian style, if you want to be very fashionable, though I do not quite see how you will keep your hat on when you have done it. But there is something magical about Greek coiffures, or else how could they have done their hair in those wonderful clusters before the advent of hairpins? I saw Clara the other day: she is looking very well, but I do hope she will not try to do her hair this way. It would not suit her one bit, but that is the worst of fashions—we all try to follow them whether they suit us or not.

Caroline has made some wonderful ornaments with the help of cigar labels, so there is a new occupation for us poor, idle women in the long winter evenings. A gold-fish bowl, or any other shaped receptacle in plain glass will do, and then the labels are gummed on on the inside so as to quite cover the surface. Then their own backs are painted to hide what they really are, and, lo! there is the effect of exquisite glowing hues, such as might have come from dusky Fez or some strange Persian city. Cigar labels are the last things you would guess it to be made of, until you examined it closely. You had better begin to collect from Uncle Jack. They do not want much arranging, though the handsomest should go in the middle.

When writing to Aimée last I asked her to tell me what Christmas is like at Johannesburg. She replies:—

Oh, Kaffirs have been firm or booming for two months past. Christmas this year will be a bright season in Johannesburg. I believe the New Year is to give us all improving times, and in any case we are confident with better cause than we have had since the war. Last Christmas such gaiety as then was, was forced, for the year opened under gathering and very ominous clouds. Christmas is midsummer in the Transvaal, you know, and the Rand has a climate that many an old traveller has declared to be the best in the world.

How do we spend Christmas? Well, we buy Christmas cards and feverishly despatch them by the Christmas mail for "Home" early in December; then up to Christmas Eve one buys toys for all the children one knows or whose parents one likes; when that day comes you hire a victoria (the cab and hansom of Johannesburg) and leave your gifts at the different houses of your friends. You are sure to be dining out on Christmas Eve, and after the party you turn in at midnight to mass in the Roman Catholic church in Kerk Street. It is crammed, and there is brilliance and music, and reverence in the minds of the worshippers, as one sees in the faces of all kinds. For this is a far-off country! You walk home blinking lazily under the gleaming bright firmament of the Southern Cross. Service at the Church of England on Christmas morning is attended by Lord Milner and his suite.

and the world and his wife, with the sons and daughters who are not at school in England, and others, make a packed congregation. "Hark! the Herald Angels Sing," bursts in volume out through the open doors and windows of the too barnlike building, into the sun-filled and now quiet streets.

The Christmas dinner following church is tradition's own, and every house includes guests. "Park Town" dines in the evening, and may take a picnic luncheon out on the hills that are round about Johannesburg, but by preference the fashionable suburb sits at home all afternoon with open doors, and receives its friends. All day you are meeting and congratulating friends, for the place is not scattered, and on the morrow (Boxing Day) there is a ball at the Wanderers' Club, to follow the Race Meeting at Turffontein. Demands of public charities and hospitable private hostesses are innumerable. Rich and poor, vulgar and gentle, even official British society is gay and glad, for the season is the Britisher's own festival as much in an outland as at home, and the market is firm!!

Here is a seasonable recipe for you. Try this turkey à la St. Maurice:—

Have a plump hen turkey duly cleansed and trussed. Pound 4 oz. of scraped veal until it is soft, add 4 oz. of scraped fat bacon, 4 oz. of cold, braised sweetbread, 4 oz. of butter, and a tablespoonful of very thick white sauce. Pound the ingredients well together, add two whole eggs and a yolk, season with salt and pepper, and rub it through a coarse wire sieve. Mix in two tablespoonfuls of chopped truffle and a spoonful of chopped red tongue, and stuff all into the breast of the turkey. Cover the breast with slices of carrot, onion, and celery; on this tie a thick sheet of buttered paper, and then braise the bird in good stock.

Make a pint of sauce from the liquor in which the bird was braised, seasoned with salt, pepper, a squeeze of lemon juice, and a gill of cream. Remove the string and vegetables from the turkey, pour the sauce over it, and garnish it with alternate groups of cardoons and chestnuts.

To Prepare the Cardoons.—Take the white part of two heads of cardoons, cut them into pieces three inches long, and adding a tablespoonful of vinegar; blanch them in salted water for 15 or 20 minutes. Then remove them from the fire and wash them thoroughly with cold water; after which put them on to braise for two hours with good stock, a little salt, a squeeze of lemon juice, and a good-sized piece of butter; cover them with buttered paper, and replace the lid. When they are done remove the paper and reduce the stock to demi-glaze.

To Braise Chestnuts.—Remove the outer shell and the inner skin of about twenty-five large chestnuts, which is done after boiling them ten minutes in salted water. Then stew them in good stock until they are the consistency of a mealy potato, after which reduce the liquor to demi-glaze
